

LETTERS OF
THOMAS CARLYLE

EDITED BY

CHARLES TOWNSEND COPELAND

THE LIBRARY OF
THE UNIVERSITY OF CALIFORNIA
LOS ANGELES

Digitized by the Internet Archive in 2008 with funding from Microsoft Corporation

Thomas Carlyle

CRITICAL AND MISCELLANEOUS ESSAYS.

With Portrait and Index. Riverside Edition.

4 vols. 12mo, $7.50.

Popular Edition. With Portrait. 2 vols. 12mo, $3.50.

CORRESPONDENCE OF CARLYLE AND EM-

ERSON, 1834-1872. Edited by CHARLES

ELIOT NORTON. Including newly found Letters and new Portraits. 2 vols, crown 8vo,

$4.00.

LETTERS OF THOMAS CARLYLE TO HIS

YOUNGEST SISTER. Edited by CHARLES

T. COPELAND. Crown 8vo, $1.50.

HOUGHTON, MIFFLIN & CO.

BOSTON AND NEW YORK.

Yours always
J. Cable

LETTERS
OF Thomas Carlyle

TO HIS YOUNGEST SISTER

EDITED WITH AN INTRODUCTORY ESSAY BY
CHARLES TOWNSEND COPELAND

LECTURER ON ENGLISH LITERATURE IN HARVARD UNIVERSITY

WITH PORTRAITS AND OTHER ILLUSTRATIONS

BOSTON AND NEW YORK
HOUGHTON, MIFFLIN AND COMPANY

The Riverside Press, Cambridge

1899

COPYRIGHT, 1899, BY HOUGHTON, MIFFLIN AND COMPANY
ALL RIGHTS RESERVED

LBR IR-12-50

PK
4433
A3
1899

PREFACE

THE letters printed in this volume were mainly written by Thomas Carlyle to his youngest sister, Mrs. Robert Hanning, who died in Toronto on the thirteenth day of December, 1897. Other members of the family are represented in the correspondence; there are a few letters — these perhaps the most interesting — from Carlyle to his mother; a few, also, from the mother to her oldest and to her youngest child. The collection extends from 1832 to 1890, when Mr. John Carlyle Aitken wrote to inform his aunt, Mrs. Hanning, of the death of James Carlyle, her youngest brother.

The editor of these letters found it desirable to make a careful study of all the published Carlyle documents. The introductory essay on Carlyle as a Letter-Writer grew out of a comparison between Carlyle's correspondence with his family, and his letters to other persons, already printed by Mr. Norton and Mr. Froude.

CONTENTS

	PAGE
CARLYLE AS A LETTER-WRITER	1
LETTERS
I. CARLYLE TO JANET CARLYLE, SCOTSBRIG, January 23, 1832	43
II. CARLYLE TO MRS. HANNING, MANCHESTER, May 16, 1836	54
III. CARLYLE TO MRS. HANNING, MANCHESTER, July 8, 1836	61
IV. TO MRS. HANNING, MANCHESTER, FROM HER MOTHER, November 3, 1836	63
V. CARLYLE TO MRS. HANNING, MANCHESTER, January 19, 1837	66
VI. TO MRS. HANNING, MANCHESTER, FROM HER MOTHER, April 9 (1837)	75
VII. CARLYLE TO MRS. HANNING, MANCHESTER, June 20, 1837	77
VIII. CARLYLE TO MRS. HANNING, MANCHESTER, July 18, 1837	80
IX. CARLYLE TO MRS. HANNING, MANCHESTER, August 28, 1837.	87
X. TO MRS. HANNING, MANCHESTER, FROM HER MOTHER, January 11 (1838)	93
XI. CARLYLE TO MRS. HANNING, KIRTLEBRIDGE, February 7, 1840.	96
XII. CARLYLE TO HIS MOTHER, SCOTSBRIG, August 1, 1840	102
XIII. CARLYLE TO MRS. HANNING, KIRTLEBRIDGE, October 7, 1840	105
XIV. CARLYLE TO MRS. HANNING, KIRTLEBRIDGE, January 15, 1841	109
XV. CARLYLE TO HIS MOTHER, SCOTSBRIG (February, 1841)	112

XVI. CARLYLE TO MRS. HANNING, DUMFRIES, November 24, 1841	115
XVII. CARLYLE TO HIS MOTHER, SCOTSBRIG, January 8, 1842	118
XVIII. CARLYLE TO HIS MOTHER, SCOTSBRIG, June 4, 1842	124
XIX. CARLYLE TO HIS MOTHER, SCOTSBRIG, July 4, 1842	127
XX. CARLYLE TO MRS. HANNING, THE GILL, July 21, 1842	129
XXI. CARLYLE TO HIS MOTHER, SCOTSBRIG, September 7, 1842	132
XXII. To CARLYLE FROM HIS MOTHER, September 13, 1842	146
XXIII. To MRS. HANNING, THE GILL, FROM HER MOTHER, Monday (1840-1851)	147
XXIV. CARLYLE TO HIS MOTHER, SCOTSBRIG, September 19, 1842	148
XXV. CARLYLE TO MRS. HANNING, THE GILL, November 2, 1842	150
XXVI. CARLYLE TO HIS MOTHER, SCOTSBRIG (early September, 1843)	154
XXVII. CARLYLE TO HIS MOTHER, SCOTSBRIG, September 12, 1843	156
XXVIII. CARLYLE TO HIS MOTHER, SCOTSBRIG, December 6, 1843	160
XXIX. CARLYLE TO HIS MOTHER, SCOTSBRIG, March 10, 1844	162
XXX. CARLYLE TO MRS. JAMES AUSTIN, THE GILL, April 30, 1844	169
XXXI. CARLYLE TO DR. JOHN CARLYLE, SCOTSBRIG, August 5, 1844	172
XXXII. CARLYLE TO MRS. HANNING, December 16, 1844	175
XXXIII. CARLYLE TO HIS MOTHER, SCOTSBRIG, July 12, 1845	177
XXXIV. CARLYLE TO HIS MOTHER, SCOTSBRIG, October 17, 1845	180
XXXV. CARLYLE TO HIS MOTHER, SCOTSBRIG, October 31, 1845	182

XXXVI. CARLYLE TO HIS MOTHER, SCOTSBRIG (November 1/15, 1845)	185
XXXVII. CARLYLE TO MRS. HANNING, DUMFRIES, June 29, 1846.	187
XXXVIII. CARLYLE TO MRS. AITKEN, DUMFRIES, October 17, 1846.	190
XXXIX. CARLYLE TO MRS. HANNING, DUMFRIES, August 18, 1849	192
XL. MRS. THOMAS CARLYLE TO MRS. HANNING, DUMFRIES (spring of 1851)	196
XLI. JOHN AITKEN CARLYLE TO MRS. HANNING, HAMILTON, C. W., June 27, 1851	198
XLII. CARLYLE TO ALEXANDER CARLYLE, CANADA, October 24, 1851.	201
XLIII. CARLYLE TO MRS. HANNING, CANADA, April 22, 1853.	206
XLIV. CARLYLE TO MRS. HANNING, CANADA, December 28, 1853	210
XLV. CARLYLE TO MRS. HANNING, HAMILTON, C. W., April 8, 1855	217
XLVI. CARLYLE TO MRS. HANNING, HAMILTON, C. W., January 7, 1859	220
XLVII. CARLYLE TO MRS. HANNING, HAMILTON, C. W., April 30, 1860	223
XLVIII. CARLYLE TO MRS. HANNING, HAMILTON, C. W., February 28, 1861	226
XLIX. CARLYLE TO MRS. HANNING, HAMILTON, C. W., August 13, 1863	229
L. CARLYLE TO MRS. HANNING, HAMILTON, C. W., May 4, 1865	232
LI. CARLYLE TO MRS. HANNING, HAMILTON, C. W., February 14, 1868	236
LII. CARLYLE TO MRS. HANNING, HAMILTON, C. W., February 13, 1871	238
LIII. CARLYLE TO MRS. HANNING, HAMILTON, C. W., January 2, 1873	242
LIV. MISS MARY AITKEN TO MRS. HANNING, HAMILTON, C. W., February 3, 1874	243
LV. CARLYLE TO MRS. HANNING, HAMILTON, C. W., April 12, 1875	248

LVI. CARLYLE TO DR. JOHN CARLYLE, DUMFRIES, September 21, 1878	251
LVII. MRS. ALEXANDER CARLYLE TO MRS. HAN- NING, HAMILTON, C. W., July 18, 1880.	254
LVIII. MR. JOHN CARLYLE AITKEN TO MRS. HAN- NING, HAMILTON, C. W., February 11, 1881	256
LIX. MRS. ALEXANDER CARLYLE TO MRS. HANNING, HAMILTON, C. W., March 3, 1881	259
LX. MR. JOHN CARLYLE TO MRS. HANNING, HAM- ILTON, C. W., May 11, 1890	266
INDEX	271

LIST OF ILLUSTRATIONS

	PAGE
THOMAS CARLYLE	Frontispiece.
THE VILLAGE OF ECCLEFECHAN. From a photograph . .	42
CARLYLE IN THE GARDEN OF NO. 5 CHEYNE ROW. From a photograph in the possession of Carlyle's niece, Mrs. G. M. Franklin	99
FACSIMILE OF A LETTER TO MRS. HANNING. An addi- tional letter, not printed elsewhere in the book	152
JANE WELSH CARLYLE. From an early photograph now in the possession of Mrs. Hanning's family	196
CARLYLE'S MOTHER. From a photograph of a painting . .	217
THOMAS CARLYLE. From a photograph, taken in his old age, by Elliott & Fry, London	237
JANET CARLYLE HANNING. From a photograph	255

CARLYLE AS A LETTER-WRITER

Most persons (perhaps because consciously or unconsciously they hold the opinion of George Eliot, that serious subjects should not be discussed in letters) try to entertain their correspondents, when they sit down to write a friendly letter. Famous writers are no exception to this rule. Horace Walpole adapts his materials with the nicest art; Gray is seldom elegiac in prose; and Chesterfield, not content with urging his son to "sacrifice to the Graces," makes his own epistles an oblation on the altar of those ladies. It is evident that the younger Pliny chooses his best stylus, whether a Tuscan villa, or the eruption of Vesuvius, or a Corinthian statuette form his theme; and the fact that all is composed in fear of Cicero and to the glory of the Latin language cannot have made the composition less acceptable to his contemporaries. The letters of Charles Lamb, the "argument" of whose life was suited to a Greek tragedy, must often have carried sunshine — quaintly filtered through Lamb's personality — to people who, had they but known it, were far better off than their correspondent. Cowper, the best of English letter-writers, was also one of the most cheerful, and in some of the last communications with his friends, before the darkness had quite settled over him, showed himself touchingly conscious of the social bond. It was nearly always dark with Cowper when he was addressing the Reverend John Newton, the evil genius who tried to be his good genius; but let it be remembered that Cowper wrote to Newton the escape of the hares, — a miniature Gilpin in prose. Most of what came from Olney and Weston, indeed, gave and repeated an impression of sprightly serenity that — except in the letters to Newton — seldom allowed itself to be clouded with the fear which so often kept Cowper trembling. When Madame de Sévigné smiles through her tears, her face turned always toward her daughter, we love her most. We do not feel that she is not making the best of things, but merely that the gayety of her century, thus dashed, is brought nearer the key of our own.

Looked at from this point of view of good spirits, whether real or benevolently feigned, Carlyle is in blackest contrast to the genial tradition of letter-writing. As early as when he was with the Bullers at Kinnaird, he had frightened his family with an eloquent diagnosis of the torments of dyspepsia, and afterward often practiced a becoming caution in complaining too loudly of anything to them. Toward the world in general, however, and toward his brother John — who alone of the family lived in the world — he seldom observed such care. What he felt, he thought; and what he thought, he wrote. The denunciatory mood was frequent with Carlyle, and it would be easy to collect enough of his secular anathemas for a droll sort of commination service. Men, women, and children, if they disturbed him, came in for his curse. All annoyances spoke to Carlyle and his wife through a megaphone, and were proclaimed by them through a still larger variety of the same instrument. Every cock that crowed near their house was a clarion out of tune, and the “demon-fowls” were equaled by dogs, of which each had to their ears the barking power of Cerberus. When Carlyle traveled, fierce imprecations upon everything viatic were wafted back from every stage to the poor “Goody” in Cheyne Row, often while she was facing alone the problem of fresh paint and paper. On the only occasion I can now recall of Carlyle himself being at home during repairs, they were to him what a convulsion of nature would be to most of us, and his outcries were of cosmic vehemence and shrillness. In these wild splutterings of genius, a maid servant was a "puddle," a "scandalous randy," or even a "sluttish harlot;" a man servant was a "flunkey;" and, if he waked Carlyle too early in the morning, he was a "flunkey of the devil." Rank, wealth, and worldly respectability were, it need not at this day be said, no defense against these grotesque indictments. The clergy and lovers of the clergy — unless, indeed, they happened to be anæmic and "Socinian" — were always accused of "shovel-hattedness." Persons who, from Plato to Scott, waged no visible warfare with their own souls, and lived their lives without stated conversion from "the everlasting No," were rarely acceptable to Carlyle. Any man of his acquaintance who, besides being thus at ease in Zion, had also gathered worldly gear, was apt, according to Carlyle, to have lost his humanity in "gigmanity." London, in the word he gladly borrowed from Cobbett, was a "monstrous wen;" Europe, "a huge suppuration;" mankind, "mostly fools;" and the world at large, "a dusty, fuliginous chaos."

If, in moods which give forth such words, Carlyle seems to write with a quill plucked from the fretful porpentine, a new book of Lamentations might be gathered from his other frequent and familiar condition. This was the state of body and soul which moved him to sorrow and repining over himself, England, and the world. If he had never made his great success in literature, these wailing cries might plausibly be assigned to the disappointed ambitions of a man whose lot was even more embittered by dyspepsia. But in this respect the tone of the apprentice, throughout a wearifully long apprenticeship, was strangely like that of the past master in literature, who for the last twenty years of his life was the most eminent of English writers. There is doubtless a habit of mourning as of rejoicing, and habit counted for much with Carlyle. Yet what I am disposed to contend is that though Aladdin's lamp had lighted him to a success even earlier than Sheridan's or Kipling's, his books and letters would still from time to time have sounded the whole gamut of Jeremiah. It was in his Scotch blood that thus they should, — in his Puritan spirit and his Puritanical digestion. In short, Carlyle's melancholy was from temperament far more than from circumstance, — a spiritual habitude to which he was destined and born.

See the sparks fly upward in March, 1822 :
“ Art is long and life is short; and of the threescore and ten years allotted to the liver, how small a portion is spent in anything but vanity and vice, if not in wretchedness, and worse than unprofitable struggling with the adamantine laws of fate! I am wae when I think of all this, but it cannot be helped.” More than forty years after, the sad-eyed victor in his chosen field reminds us that he, more than most men, is born to trouble. In 1865 he writes to Emerson from Annandale :
“ I live in total solitude, sauntering moodily in thin checkered woods, galloping about, once daily, by old lanes and roads, oftenest latterly on the wide expanses of Solway shore (when the tide is out!) where I see bright busy Cottages far off, houses over even in Cumberland, and the beautifullest amphitheatre of eternal Hills, — but meet no living creature; and have endless thoughts as loving and as sad and sombre as I like.” This is none the less (perhaps, rather, the more) sad, for all the wide and shining landscape. A few lines later Carlyle says: "You perceive me sufficiently at this point of my Pilgrimage, as withdrawn to Hades for the time being; intending a month's walk there, till the muddy semi-solutions settle into sediment according to what laws they have, and there be perhaps a partial restoration of clearness." The voice of 1865, though early in the interim it gained its individual accent, is still the voice of 1822.

Malice was operant in this choice of a passage from one of Carlyle's letters to Emerson, to show the frequent hue of his spirit. For not only is the mere thought of Emerson a cause of cheer to most men,—to Carlyle himself it usually brought comfort,—but Carlyle had adopted Emerson, or more nearly adopted him than any one else except Sterling, into the close communion of his own family, toward whom he generally showed compunction in the matter of invective and lament. Yet in writing to Emerson and to them he would sometimes forget his restraint, and, while eating his heart, would invite them to the same repast. It has been said that Froude made an exceptionally gloomy selection from Carlyle's correspondence, and that Mr. Norton's volumes give a fairer view of the habitual tone of his spirits. So far as they are concerned with Emerson and with Carlyle's kindred, an explanation of the higher average of cheerfulness has already been offered. But even in these letters, and still more in the rest of Mr. Norton's selections, one is tempted to inquire whether he did not intend (and very properly) to redress the balance which Froude had unduly weighted on the other side. For the essence and gist of Carlyle's published writings — books, letters, and journals — is that "it is not a merry place, this world; it is a stern and awful place." Much that is meat to other men was poison, or tinctured with poison, to him. "My letter, you will see" (he wrote to his brother John in 1828), "ends in sable, like the life of man. My own thoughts grow graver every day I live." He could, and did, suck melancholy from his own successful lectures, from his own books and the books of others, from the state of the nation and the state of his own health, from society, from solitude. Craigenputtock, high on the moors between Dumfriesshire and Galloway, and sixteen miles from the town of Dumfries, has always seemed to me the right scenic background for Carlyle. The stone farmhouse, surrounded by a few acres of land reclaimed from peat bog, stands in the midst of bleak hills, seven hundred feet above the level of the sea. This is the right scenery for Carlyle, and many of his most characteristic letters, from whatever places written, carry with them a feeling of the north, November, and the moors. Had Froude left any gaps in his biography, they might be bridged with sighs.

Persons who talked with Carlyle, or who heard him talk, often received a different impression. This was, no doubt, partly because his pentecostal gift excited him to a variety and fire of speech for which he afterward paid the penalty of a natural enough reaction ; partly, also, because the sense of humor never deserted him at those moments, and rich gusts of laughter swept away boding prophecy, fierce invective, and the whole symbolic apparatus of Carlylean denunciation. Humor, indeed, is always to be reckoned with in Carlyle ; and his letters, like his books, abound in a range of it — seldom genial — that extends from the grim to the farcical. But you cannot hear a man laugh in print ; and where in a Carlyle conversation the stage direction would be, "Exit laughing," in a Carlyle letter it appears, "Exit groaning" or "Exit swearing." The writer "laughs off," as Macbeth and Macduff "fight off;" and the reader hears but the ghost of a laugh, — a faint, imagined reverberation.

Hence, loathèd Melancholy, and a truce to sable. I have, perhaps, made too much of a striking characteristic, however indubitable, of a great writer. The famous rat was not always gnawing at the pit of his stomach; and when neither the mood of vituperation nor the mood of lament was upon him, he was of too vigorous and too honest a mind not to discuss with comparative calmness many subjects that interested him. What did interest him and what didn't, what appears in his letters and what is never seen there, would make a catalogue fairly descriptive of Carlyle's intellectual and moral constitution. Food and raiment he seldom writes of, save as necessities of life. No Christmas gastronomy in his letters, no rule for "cooking a chub," no incipient essay on roast pig. As Carlyle's pen is never occupied with cards, one concludes that "old women to play whist with of an evening," so much desired by a certain delightful letter-writer, were not a desideratum with him. Women, in fact, play no dominantly feminine part in his life. Love, as a passion, he apparently does not understand. He gave no more sensitive response to the fine arts than Emerson, in whose books there are many "blind places," — so says Mr. Chapman in his original and important essay on Emerson, — "like the notes which will not strike on a sick piano." To name the theatre is, with Carlyle, to scorn it. Goethe himself could not make him care for plays or play-acting. Goethe's Wilhelm Meister he learned to admire, although, had any other written it, the book would have had from him the treatment it got from Wordsworth. If we may believe Froude, Carlyle called some of the most noteworthy French novels "a new Phallus worship, with Sue, Balzac, and Co. for prophets, and Madame Sand for a virgin." Poetry, art allied to his own, interests Carlyle only through its thought or its lesson. In the actual affairs of life, he desires neither money, rank, nor political power. He gives no adherence to any religious creed, political faith, or party leader. He often feels himself in a "minority of one," but on a certain occasion doubles the number, to include Emerson.

Here may end, without special reason for ending, the catalogue of negatives by which people learn to know Carlyle in his letters. Shorter, not less impressive or informing, is the list of positives. Words Carlyle must have had at least a sneaking fondness for. He does not admit it, but he uses words and phrases in a way that tells its own story to those upon whose ears his noblest strains fall like music. Very often, as he intended, the words stand for facts, which he loved, and for which he was proud to tell his love. Purity, honor, and truth are dear to Carlyle, and he celebrates them in his letters. "Poor and sad humanity," although it often moves him to scorn, never quite loses its hold upon him: his letters are a crowded thoroughfare of human beings, who live again at his touch. Good sayings — pious, shrewd, sage, or humorous, as the case may be — this eloquent talker rolls under his tongue, especially when they are in the speech of the Scottish people. His taste for humor is catholic enough to relish jokes; and he himself, unclannish chiefly in that, jokes without difficulty. Strength of any kind bulks so large in Carlyle's esteem that the historian of Cromwell and Friedrich has often been accused of making might his right. After years of what he felt to be misrepresentation, he endeavored to set things straight by declaring that right, in the long run, was pretty sure to be mighty. However this may be, the strength of contemporary leaders was likely, by his thinking, to be founded on unrighteousness; and it was easier for him to worship his heroes through the long nave of the past. There was an altar for Cromwell, but — alas that it should have been so — there was none for Lincoln.

Although these positives are lengthening themselves out, there must be mention here of the mother, wife, family, and friends, who figure so engrossingly in Carlyle's correspondence. I think we gather from the grand total of documents in the case that he loved his mother more deeply and singly than he loved any other person. Yet for his wife he had a strong, often disquieted affection. The expression of this in his letters to her, which are as remarkable for emotion as for a very high order of writing, is of course less checkered than it could have been in the faring together of two such yoke-fellows. In the action of temperament upon temperament, like does not cure like. During the long episode of Gloriana, it is often possible to read between the lines of Carlyle's letters to his wife. After the death of the first Lady Ashburton, however, occurs the most striking passage of self-accusation to be found in any letter before the death of Mrs. Carlyle. Carlyle writes to her on the 11th of July, 1858: —

“ All yesterday I remarked, in speaking to —, if any tragic topic came in sight, I had a difficulty to keep from breaking down in my speech, and becoming inarticulate with emotion over it. It is as if the scales were falling from my eyes, and I were beginning to see in this, my solitude, things that touch me to the very quick. Oh, my little woman! what a suffering thou hast had, and how nobly borne! with a simplicity, a silence, courage, and patient heroism which are only now too evident to me. Three waer days I can hardly remember in my life; but they were not without worth either; very blessed some of the feelings, though many so sore and miserable. It is very good to be left alone with the truth sometimes, to hear with all its sternness what it will say to one.”

It is often to be noted that no great moment finds Carlyle without a great word. Moving as is the utterance just quoted, it is dumb in comparison with this, written after the death of Mrs. Carlyle: "Not for above two days could I estimate the immeasurable depths of it, or the infinite sorrow which had peeled my life all bare, and in a moment shattered my poor world to universal ruin."

Mother, wife, family, and one or two friends, then, were very dear to Carlyle. "Love me a little," he writes once to Emerson. Next to these few persons, nature had perhaps the strongest sway over him; and the strange, beautiful landscapes that shine out from some of his darkest letters would be enough to found a reputation on. The phrases live in one's memory as if they had line and color.

Two main facts detach themselves, I think, from these imperfect suggestions of what Carlyle's letters contain and what they are vacant of. In the first place, no one can doubt that although — except in writing to the Annandale kin — Carlyle seldom attempts to control himself, is seldom interesting or entertaining of set purpose, he is yet, for interest and entertainment, a letter-writer among a thousand. Single-minded and single-hearted, true as the very truth, in the words of his mouth he utters the meditations of his heart. Gifted with eloquence, with humor, with pathos, with eyes that see everything and a memory that loses nothing, with an energy of speech which (compared with that given to the majority of his fellow creatures) is clearly superhuman, Carlyle uses his amazing literary vehicle as an Arabian magic carpet to transport him to his correspondent. The letter is the writer; the word is the man.

So much for one fact. The other, not now stated for the first time, is that Carlyle, in his familiar letters as in his published works, presents the curious combination of mystic and realist. The world that can be tested by the senses is, in Carlyle's belief, only the vesture, sometimes muddy, sometimes clear, of the divine principle. For many readers, the expression of this ruling idea of Carlyle and his work is confused not only by apparently contradictory phrasings, but by the shifting of his conception of God between theism and pantheism. When, however, Carlyle utters himself most earnestly and most characteristically on this cardinal point of his belief, no manner of man can misunderstand him. "Matter," exclaims he, "exists only spiritually, and to represent some idea and body it forth. Heaven and Earth are but the time-vesture of the Eternal. The Universe is but one vast symbol of God ; nay, if thou wilt have it, what is man himself but a symbol of God ? Is not all that he does symbolical, a revelation to sense of the mystic God-given force that is in him ? — a gospel of Freedom, which he, the ‘ Messiah of Nature,’ preaches as he can by act and word.” It was only to be expected that the favorite quotation of a man whose high belief can be stated thus, of a man who regarded time as an illusion, should be the lines from Shakespeare’s Tempest : —

“ We are such stuff
As dreams are made on, and our little life
Is rounded with a sleep.”

Now, although it is proverbially difficult to prove a negative, the ease with which a negative can be stated should be equally matter of proverb. Accordingly, we find that Carlyle, in his letters, a hundred times denounces the world as he sees it for once that he describes, or even suggests, the world as he would see it. Silent heroes should be the rulers of England. Silent heroes are rare birds, even among the dead. Instead of them, talking parliamentarians are at the head of things; and Carlyle has to say what he thinks of Gladstone and Disraeli, the alternately ruling talkers. When, in 1874, Disraeli proposed to grant him a pension and bestow on him also the Grand Cross of the Bath, he wrote to John Carlyle: "I do, however, truly admire the magnanimity of Dizzy in regard to me. He is the only man I almost never spoke of except with contempt."

Men of letters fare no better than men of action. They should be priests, in white, unspotted robes. What does Carlyle find them? In 1824, after pinning Coleridge, De Quincey, Hazlitt, and Leigh Hunt fiercely to the page, he writes to Miss Welsh: "'Good heavens!' I often inwardly exclaim, 'and is this the literary world?' This rascal rout, this dirty rabble, destitute not only of high feeling and knowledge or intellect, but even of common honesty! The very best of them are ill-natured weaklings. They are not red-blooded men at all. . . . Such is the literary world of London; indisputably the poorest part of its population at present." So Carlyle wrote of writers when he was putting on his literary armor, and not very differently when he was putting it off. His Hero as Man of Letters was almost invariably seen at a distance, either of time or space. He spitted Coleridge on his sharpest spear, and two blasting, withering descriptions of Charles Lamb — with forty years between them for reflection — remain to the everlasting hurt of Carlyle's own reputation.

Vitriol blesseth neither him that gives nor him that takes, yet Carlyle stayed to the end of his many days essentially high-minded. Honorable, simple, helpful, charitable in deed though not in word, he was seen at the limit of his course to have a better heart, a character less deteriorated, than many a man — no less good at the start — who has indulged himself with “omitting the negative proposition.” The habit of scorn would in the long run have been more harmful to character than the habit of tolerance and facile praise, except that Carlyle had an extraordinarily high standard of principle and performance, and held to it not only in his judgment of others, but also in what he exacted of himself. The fact that Carlyle never tried to reconcile the inconsistency (as it may have seemed to some persons) between the Deity of his worship and the symbolic manifestations of that Deity in a world so little to Carlyle's liking no doubt helped him to keep his spiritual integrity.

In company and contrast with the mysticism of Carlyle's thought — "idealism" is the better word, if it be strictly interpreted — is the eager realism of his literary methods. As a result of this piquant union, Carlyle means one thing to one man, and another, quite different thing to another man. The Carlyle of X, the strait idealist, is a moonish philosopher, to be shunned by A, the strait realist, who rejoices in the closely packed narrative, the wild action, and the portraits of men and women, that make but a trivial appeal to X. This union of natures is plain enough in Shakespeare, in whom nothing surprises. The hand which gave us the Tempest gave us also Juliet's nurse and Hotspur's description of "a certain Lord." Too often, however, the idealist's grasp of the concrete is wavering and intermittent; too often the soul of the realist needs little feeding.

Carlyle vibrated between these two elements of his nature, and fortified one with the other. When, after burrowing in the dust-heap of the past or fishing into "the general Mother of Dead Dogs," he had brought to light some pearl (or, it might be, only some oyster-shell) of fact, he often improved the opportunity to show the larger significance of the little gleam or glint of reality. It was the defect of a fine quality that, in his later work, and especially in Frederick, he spent himself on irrelevant facts which helped to make Carlyle's longest book a splendid failure, with episodes of indubitable success.

The looser form of the letter more properly admits the isolated concrete. Shrewd, welcome bits of fact are everywhere in Carlyle's letters; everywhere, too, are those other expressions of a great realist, — vividly "composed" elements of landscape, and portraits that give every token of life except breath. As with every artist, whatever he depicts takes color from him, and is seen through his temperament. In the summer of 1837 Carlyle writes to Sterling from Scotsbrig: "One night, late, I rode through the village where I was born. The old kirkyard tree, a huge old gnarled ash, was nestling itself softly against the great twilight in the north. A star or two looked out, and the old graves were all there, and my father and my sister; and God was above us all." Here be worn, familiar things. Gray has been to the village churchyard at the hour of parting day, and a procession has followed in his footsteps. But this kirkyard, where Carlyle has since laid himself down with his kindred, is Carlyle's.

The reappearance (usually heightened or elaborated) of bits of prospect or topography first recorded in Carlyle's letters is an interesting characteristic of his writing. His first visit to Paris was of much service to him in fixing the places and scenes of The French Revolution; the trip into the country of Cromwell's birth and the examination of Naseby field come into sight again in the book,—witness especially the "Cease your fooling," and the troopers' teeth that bit into Carlyle's memory; and a number of rough drafts for details of Frederick appear in letters from the Continent. A brief note, during a visit to Mr. Redwood in 1843, of the Glamorganshire "green network of intricate lanes, mouldering ruins, vigorous vegetation good and bad," was afterward dilated (in the Life of Sterling) into the spacious and beautiful landscape beginning: "Llanblethian hangs pleasantly, with its white cottages, and orchard and other trees, on the western slope of a green hill; looking far and wide over green meadows and little or bigger hills, in the pleasant plain of Glamorgan."

Distinguished as are Carlyle's portraits of places, it is probably his portraits of persons that abide longest and most completely in the memories of most readers. Robespierre, Mirabeau and Mirabeau père, Frederick and Frederick William, — it is one sign of Carlyle's power that he can make subordinate characters salient and still bring out his hero, — Voltaire, Cromwell, and the Abbot Samson, are a few of the pictures that line his galleries. Wonderful as are these renderings of men he never saw, his sketches of men he had known are almost literally "speaking likenesses." Coleridge, Leigh Hunt, Dickens, Thackeray, Tennyson, Mazzini, Louis Napoleon, are among the many who are painted to a miracle in Carlyle's letters. Behold a great American, in a letter to Emerson : —

"Not many days ago I saw at breakfast the notablist of all your Notabilities, Daniel Webster. He is a magnificent specimen; you might say to all the world, This is your Yankee Englishman, such Limbs we make in Yankee-land! As a Logic-fencer, Advocate, or Parliamentary Hercules, one would incline to back him at first sight against all the extant world. The tanned complexion, that amorphous craglike face; the dull black eyes under their precipice of brows, like dull anthracite furnaces, needing only to be blown ; the mastiff-mouth, accurately closed : — I have not traced as much of silent Berserker-rage, that I remember of, in any other man. ‘I guess I should not like to be your nigger!’”

At the risk of numbering this paper with the books of Chrysippus, we must look again at the portrait of De Quincey, which is, perhaps, the artist’s chief triumph. Although it is to be found in the Reminiscences, it yet belongs here well enough, for that book is not so much a book as a long, rambling letter, partly of remorse, partly of pity, from Carlyle to himself. “He was a pretty little creature,” says this terrible, sad old man, remembering after forty years, “full of wire-drawn ingenuities ; bankrupt enthusiasms, bankrupt pride ; with the finest silver-toned low voice, and most elaborate gently-winding courtesies and ingenuities of conversation : ‘What would n’t one give to have him in a Box, and take him out to talk !’ (That was Her criticism of him ; and it was right good.) A bright, ready and melodious talker ; but in the end an inconclusive and long-winded. One of the smallest man-figures I ever saw ; shaped like a pair of tongs ; and hardly above five feet in all : when he sat, you would have taken him, by candle-light, for the beautifullest little Child ; blue-eyed, blonde-haired, sparkling face, — had there not been a something too, which said, ‘Eccovi, this Child has been in Hell!’” One would be sure, without other evidence than “Her criticism” in this description, which is also a “character,” — to use the old word, — that She, too, had been terrible. The broken order, the curious punctuation, the capitals and italics, the leave of absence granted to the verb, the quick interjections, all taken together make the passage a concentrated example of Carlyle’s vox humana style, — of his writing when it is most like speech, sublimated.

In his use of persons, as of places, there are pregnant comparisons to be made between Carlyle’s first study and the final portrait. Sterling and old Sterling are cases in point ; Coleridge, maybe, the best instance of all. The main lines and the personal atmosphere, always visible, I think, in the sketch, are reproduced by Carlyle in the finished work. But in the heightening of lights, in the deepening of shade, in composition, above all, he makes many changes, which almost invariably result in greater intensity of effect.

From such comparisons, if patiently conducted, might come luminous comment on the question of Carlyle's style, — a question more vexed than the Bermoothes.

So far and so much for Carlyle's general aspect as a letter-writer. I have tried to show that, in addressing himself to a very few friends, and especially to his own family, he displays a different set of qualities. The difference between his vehemence toward the world at large and his gentleness toward his mother sometimes seems as marked as that between the two visions of the prophet Jeremiah: the one a seething caldron, the face thereof from the north; the other, a rod of an almond tree. The world, in truth, for this peasant of genius, was, to the considerable degree in which he remained a peasant, an assemblage of persons and things to be approached with many reserves and a deal of more or less violent disapproval. Annandale, contrariwise, was an honest, strength-giving corner of the world, which did for him through life the office of the earth to Antæus. He went back to it so often that he never lost his native accent, and, in certain respects, the point of view to which he was born. So long as Carlyle's mother lived, there was rarely a year in which he did not make a pilgrimage to Scotsbrig; and, after she died, he went oftener to her grave than most sons, dwelling at a distance from their mothers, visit them in life. Scotsbrig also came to him in the shape of letters, as well as in the unsentimental (though, rightly beheld, not unpathetic) guise of oatmeal, bacon, clothes, and what not. The Carlyles held that good meal could not be bought in London; and when the barrel wasted, it was filled again from home. One far-brought fowl we all remember as the epic subject of a letter from Mrs. Carlyle in Chelsea to her sister-in-law in Scotland. Carlyle had his clothes made in Annan, partly from thrift, partly from distrust of London tailors.

However much he depended on the people and the kindly fruits of his native soil, however much the exclusiveness of the Carlyles may have been only that common to all Scotch peasant families, it is still hard to credit, though on the excellent authority of Mrs. Oliphant, that their mutual love was not "by ordinar," even among Scotch peasants. Especially is it difficult of credence that the attachment of Carlyle and his mother was not as rare as it was beautiful. In 1832, after the death of his father, he writes to his brother Alick, at Scotsbrig : " O let us all be gentle, obedient, loving to our Mother, now that she is left wholly to our charge ! ' Honour thy Father and thy Mother ' : doubly honour thy Mother when she alone remains. " For twenty years this double honor was more than trebly paid. The son writes once to his mother : " Since I wrote last I have been in Scotsbrig more than in London. " And so it often is to the end, — and after. Dreaming and waking, he looks far up across England and the Solway. In the spring the plow and the sower pass between his eyes and the page of Cromwell or The French Revolution ; in the autumn he has a vision of the yellow fields, of " Jamie's " peat-stack, and the " cauldron " singing under his mother's window. The mother's trembling thought of her children answers their love for her. " She told me the other day " (writes one of Carlyle's sisters), " the first gaet she gaed every morning was to London, then to Italy, then to Craigenputtock, and then to Mary's, and finally began to think them at hame were, maybe, no safer than the rest. When I asked her what she wished me to say to you, she said she had a thousand things to say if she had you here ; ' and thou may tell them, I'm very little fra' them. ' "

As from his first clear earnings Carlyle sent his father a pair of spectacles, and his mother "a little sovereign to keep the fiend out of her hussif," so throughout he never forgot her in the least or the greatest particular. From year to year he sent her money and tobacco, — which they often smoked together in the farmhouse, — books and comforts and letters. The letters, of course, were far the best of all to her. Often as they came, they could not come often enough. In 1824 Margaret Carlyle wrote to her son: "Pray do not let me want food; as your father says, I look as if I would eat your letters. Write everything and soon." Everything and soon it always was; and in these many letters Carlyle strove to bring near to the untraveled ones at home all that he was seeing and doing. One means of doing this was to describe interesting places in terms of Annandale. Thus, in telling his sister Jean about Naseby, he wrote: —

"Next day they drove me over some fifteen miles off to see the field of Naseby fight — Oliver Cromwell's chief battle, or one of his chief. It was a grand scene for me — Naseby, a venerable hamlet, larger than Middlebie, all built of mud, but trim with high peaked roofs, and two feet thick of smooth thatch on them, and plenty of trees scattered round and among. It is built as on the brow of the Hagheads at Ecclefechan; Cromwell lay with his back to that, and King Charles was drawn up as at Wull Welsh's — only the Sinclair burn must be mostly dried, and the hollow much wider and deeper."

Carlyle knew that his mother would be eager to hear of Luther and Lutherland. In September of the last year but one of her life, he writes to her from Weimar that "Eisenach is about as big as Dumfries;" that a hill near by is "somewhat as Lock-erbie hill is in height and position." The donjon tower of the Wartburg (which he translates for her, Watch Castle) stands like the old Tower of Repentance on Hoddam Hill, where his mother had visited him during his "russet-coated idyll" there, many years before. "They open a door, you enter a little apartment, less than your best room at Scotsbrig, I almost think less than your smallest, a very poor low room with an old leaded lattice window; to me the most venerable of all rooms I ever entered." That afternoon they drive to Gotha in a "kind of clatch." Carlyle helps out his English for his mother with bits of their common Doric, and falls unconsciously into Scotch locutions, such as "you would be going," or "you would be doing," when he means "you are likely to go" or "likely to do." In larger matters it is the same. Carlyle may have been chanting the Miserere to some correspondent, but if he writes to his mother on the same day, the note changes to Sursum corda, even though it must visibly struggle up from the depths. Nor do the Immensities and the Eternities appear in his letters to her. In these the Lord her God is also his God.

The belief in personal immortality came to Carlyle, so far as I can discover, but dimly and infrequently. This chill lack of faith, so common in our day, sharpened the dread of his mother's death. So early as 1844 he writes in his Journal: "My dear old mother has, I doubt, been often poorly this winter. They report her well at present: but, alas! there is nothing in all the earth so stern to me as that constantly advancing inevitability, which indeed has terrified me all my days." Yet, in Carlyle's letters after her death, a dovelike peace seems to brood over his deep sorrow. With Roman piety he records the death-trance, sixteen hours long, in which his mother, her face "as that of a statue," lay waiting for the end. It was another

"Dulcis et alta quies, placidæque simillima morti;" and all Carlyle's words about that holy parting are grave and sweet.

Whatever of loveliness there may have been in the life together of Carlyle and his wife, — and there was much, in spite of all that has been said to the contrary, — in death they were far divided. She lies with her gentle forbears in the abbey kirk at Haddington; he, in Ecclefechan kirkyard with his peasant forbears. When Carlyle was dying, the Lord remembered for him the kindness of his youth, — his mother might have believed, — and "his mind seemed to turn altogether to the old Ecclefechan days." Said his niece, Mrs. Alexander Carlyle, writing just after his death: "He often took Alick for his father (uncle Sandy), and he would put his arms round my neck and say to me, 'My dear mother.'"

Great writer as Carlyle is, many critics feel that he can never become classical. The word "classic," as Sainte-Beuve has pointed out, is a stretchable term; but very possibly the Soudanese lexicographer, descended from a native of New Zealand, will label many of Carlyle's phrases "post-classical," and place him with Browning and Ruskin, who felt his influence, in the Silver Age of English. Certainly, the Soudanese Quintilian will do well to tell his pupils the story of Erasmus's ape, and warn them against the danger of imitating Carlyle. Classical or post-classical, Carlyle's name is as closely linked with the French Revolution and the Life of Oliver Cromwell, as is the name of Thucydides with the Peloponnesian War, that of Tacitus with the Emperors of the Julian line, or that of Gibbon with the Decline and Fall of their Empire. Yet even if Carlyle's historical titles were torn from his grant of immortality, he would survive as one of the most remarkable of English letter-writers.

LETTERS OF THOMAS CARLYLE TO HIS YOUNGEST SISTER

LETTERS

MRS. HANNING (Janet Carlyle) was born, as were all her brothers and sisters before her, in the village of Ecclefechan. The following notes of her life are supplied by her son-in-law, the Rev. George M. Franklin:—

“She was reckoned the neatest seamstress of the family, and received the rare compliment of praise from her eldest brother (Thomas Carlyle) for having done excellent work on some shirts. Robert Hanning, an old friend of the Carlyles, going to the same school with Janet, and ‘looking on the same book,’ wooed and won her. They were married at Scotsbrig, on March 15, 1836. They went to Manchester, England, to live, as Mr. Hanning was employed by a Mr. Craig, and subsequently was a partner in the business. This business having proved unprofitable, they returned to Scotland, and Mr. Hanning entered into business with his brother Peter as partner. This proved also a failure. Soon afterward the family went back to Dumfries. Mr. Hanning sailed for America, arriving at New York; and after working there for a time left that city for Hamilton, Ontario, his future home. Mrs. Hanning and her two children remained in Dumfries, although she had wished much to go with her husband and share his fortunes. Thomas persuaded her, 'against her judgment,' as she has said, to wait until her husband was settled. Mr. Hanning was a man of strong convictions and the highest moral principle. The reunion of his family was effected in 1851, when the wife and two daughters left Glasgow in a sailing-vessel, the passage to Quebec occupying about seven weeks. Then taking a steamer from Quebec, they reached Hamilton in good time. This was before the building of the Great Western Railway. Mrs. Hanning soon made a home for her devoted husband, earning the commendation 'brave little sister.' Mr. Hanning entered the service of the Great Western Railway of Canada in 1853, and remained with that company until his death, which occurred March 12, 1878."

An indispensable guide to the correspondence will be found in the following list, given by Professor Norton, of the children of James Carlyle, with the dates of their births, — Thomas, born December 4, 1795 (died at Chelsea, February 5, 1881); Alexander, born August 4, 1797; Janet, born September 2, 1799; John Aitkin, born July 7, 1801; Margaret, born September 20, 1803; James, born November 12, 1805; Mary, born February 2, 1808; Jean, born September 2, 1810; Janet (Mrs. Hanning), born July 18, 1813.

Among the persons mentioned by Mr. Franklin as visiting Mrs. Hanning, the most distinguished was Emerson, who went to Hamilton in the summer of 1865. "Mr. Emerson placed her in a chair near the window, so that he might the more readily examine her features, and, looking into her eyes, exclaimed, 'And so this is Carlyle's little sister!'"

Mention of "the youngest stay of the house, little Jenny," is rare and slight in the published letters and memorials of Carlyle. Froude, in an ingeniously careless passage, confuses her with an older sister, Jean. He speaks of "the youngest child of all, Jane, called the Crow, or Crow, from her black hair." Carlyle, on pages 92 and 93 of the second volume of the Reminiscences, — in Mr. Norton's edition, — mentions both Jean and Jenny: "There was a younger and youngest sister (Jenny), who is now in Canada; of far inferior 'speculative intellect' to Jean, but who has proved to have (we used to think) superior housekeeping faculties to hers."

"My prayers and affection are with you all, from little Jenny upwards to the head of the house," writes Carlyle to his mother on October 19, 1826, after a form common enough, with its variations, in his early letters. Occasionally she has done something to be noted. On October 20, 1827: "Does Jenny bring home her medals yet?" On November 15: "Does Jenny still keep her medals? Tell her that I still love her, and hope to find her a good lassie and to do her good." In the spring of 1828 Carlyle writes from Scotsbrig to his "Dear Little Crow" in Edinburgh: "Mag and Jenny are here; Jenny at the Sewing-school with Jessie Combe, and making great progress." Mrs. Carlyle adds, in a postscript to an 1835 letter to Mrs. Aitken: "Carlyle has the impudence to say he forgot to send his compliments to Jenny; as if it were possible for any one acquainted with that morsel of perfections to forget her ! Tell her I will write a letter with my own hand, and hope to see her ‘an ornament to society in every direction.’ ” In a preface — written many years after — to a letter to Jean Carlyle, bearing date November, 1825, and signed Jane Baillie Welsh, Carlyle explains : “ This Jean Carlyle is my second youngest sister, then a little child of twelve. The youngest sister, youngest of us all, was Jenny [Janet], now Mrs. Robert Hanning, in Hamilton, Canada West. These little beings, in their bits of grey speckled [black and white] straw bonnets, I recollect as a pair of neat, brisk items, tripping about among us that summer at the Hill.” Letter and preface are given by Froude, as is also a letter from Carlyle to his wife, dated Scotsbrig, May 3, 1842, and ending thus : “ Yesterday I got my hair cropped, partly by my own endeavours in the front, chiefly by sister Jenny’s in the rear. I fear you will think it rather an original cut.”

In 1827 : “ Tell her that I still love her, and hope to find her a good lassie and to do her good ; ” in 1873, in Carlyle’s last letter to Mrs. Hanning written with his own hand : “ I please myself with the thought that you will accept this little New Year's Gift from me as a sign of my unalterable affection, whⁿ, tho' it is obliged to be silent (unable to write as of old), cannot fade away until I myself do! Of that be always sure, my dear little Sister; and that if in anything I can be of help to you or yours, I right willingly will."

All the letters that follow are strung on a slender thread of biography. Even readers who know their Carlyle thoroughly may like to see, from year to year and from page to page, the contrast between his life in the world and his life with the peasant kindred who were so far from everything that men call the world. And although nothing in these letters will add to our knowledge of Carlyle, they cannot — taken together — fail to touch us freshly with the sense of what he was to his people, and what they were to him.

Carlyle's life until 1832, the year of the first letter, may be most briefly summarized. The son of James Carlyle, a stone-mason, he was born at Ecclefechan, "in a room inconceivably small," on the 4th of December, 1795. He went to school at Annan, and, in 1809, to the University of Edinburgh. Five years later he returned to the Annan school as a teacher of mathematics, and in 1816 went to Kirkcaldy to teach the same subject. After an experience of literary hack work in Edinburgh, which began when he was twenty-three years old, he became tutor in the Buller family. A long, strange, and ill-boding courtship ended, on the 17th of October, 1826, in his marriage with Jane Baillie Welsh. She had a small inherited estate at Craigenputtock, high up on the moors, and sixteen miles from Dumfries; and there, two years after their marriage, they went to live for six years. In 1831 and 1832 they were merely trying their wings in London.

ECCLEFECHAN, BIRTHPLACE OF THOMAS CARLYLE

“Mrs. Welsh” was Mrs. Carlyle’s mother. “Maister Cairlill” was a frequent name for Carlyle’s brother James. The family had been living at Scotsbrig since 1826. Carlyle was thirty-six years old, and his sister nineteen, when the following letter was written.

I. CARLYLE TO JANET CARLYLE, SCOTSBRIG.

AMPTON ST., LONDON,
23rd January, 1832.

MY DEAR JENNY, — Will you put up with the smallest of letters rather than with none at all? I have hardly a moment, and no paper but this thick, coarse sort.

Understand always, My dear Sister, that I love you well, and am very glad to see and hear that you conduct yourself as you ought. To you also, my little lassie, it is of infinite importance how you behave: were you to get a Kingdom, or twenty Kingdoms, it were but a pitiful trifle compared with this, whether you walked as God command you, and did your duty to God and to all men. You have a whole Life before you, to make much of or to make little of: see you choose the better part, my dear little sister, and make yourself and all of us pleased with you. I will add no more, but commend you from the heart (as we should all do one another) to God's keeping. May He ever bless you! I am too late, and must not wait another minute. We have this instant had a long letter from Mrs. Welsh, full of kindness to our Mother and all of you. The Cheese, &c., &c., is faithfully commemorated as a "noble" one; Mary is also made kind mention of. You did all very right on that occasion. Mrs. Welsh says she must come down to Scotsbrig and see you all. What will you think of that? Her Father, in the meantime, is very ill, and gives her incessant labour and anxiety.

See to encourage Jean to write, and do you put your hand a little to the work. What does Maister Cairlill think of the last letter he wrote us? Was it not a letter among many? He is a graceless man. I send you a portrait of one of our Chief Radicals here: it is said to be very like.

I remain always, My dear Sister,

Your affectionate

T. CARLYLE.

On January 24, — Froude gives the date wrongly as the 26th, — the day after the date of this letter, Carlyle, still in London, heard of the death of his father, at the age of seventy-three. He wrote immediately to his mother in terms which place the letter high even among his letters; and in less than a week he had uttered the wail of genius that stands first in the Reminiscences, — a book which has “no language but a cry.” By April he was back again at Craigenputtock, where it was so still that poor Mrs. Carlyle could hear the sheep nibbling a quarter of a mile away. Carlyle had now a new grief in the death of Goethe, who, making of him a disciple, had left him a teacher on his own account. The loss of Goethe found a measurable compensation in correspondence with Mill, who had been kindled into something very like fire by Carlyle's review of Croker's Boswell, just published in Fraser's Magazine. It is one of the greatest of Carlyle's briefer performances, although written at short notice. "Carlyle," said his wife, "always writes well when he writes fast." This essay, indeed, has a high place in the development of an idea which may be stated as Croker's Boswell, Macaulay's Boswell, Carlyle's Boswell, and — Boswell.

There followed now essays on Goethe and Ebenezer Elliott's Corn Law Rhymes (Carlyle's last contribution to the Edinburgh Review), and a highly important article on Diderot for the Foreign Quarterly. In the autumn of 1832, Carlyle notes that the money from the essay on Goethe has gone in part payment of Jeffrey's loan, that Craigenputtock has grown too lonely even for him, and that his literary plans demand a library. Not only must the work on Diderot have assured him of his ability to fuse and weld the most stubborn materials, but it opened his eyes to the French Revolution as a subject for his pen. Moved, then, by weariness of the solitude à deux among the peat moss, and by this new purpose in writing, the twain removed to Edinburgh toward the end of 1832.

Four months of Edinburgh were enough to convince Carlyle that here was for him no continuing city; enough, also, to enable him to collect and carry back to Craigenputtock the substance of The Diamond Necklace, one of the best of his tragi-comic pieces.

The loneliness of "the whinstone stronghold" on the moors was cheered in the following August by Emerson's memorable visit. "We went out to walk over long hills," writes Emerson in English Traits, "and looked at Criffel, then without his cap, and down into Wordsworth's country. There we sat down and talked of the immortality of the soul."

The essay on Cagliostro, written in March, 1833, was printed in Fraser's Magazine for July and August; and Fraser agreed to publish Sartor Resartus in the next volume, "only fining Carlyle eight guineas a sheet for his originality." This gadfly tax on genius; the Foreign Quarterly's refusal of The Diamond Necklace, patently a masterpiece though it was; Jeffrey's refusal to recommend Carlyle for a professorship of astronomy; and, by way of climax, the defection of one of those maids whose misdemeanors continue a servile war through so many of the Carlyle chronicles, directed Carlyle's gaze toward what Johnson thought the fairest prospect ever spread before a Scotchman. Emerson had observed that "he was already turning his eyes towards London with a scholar's appreciation," and at last, on the 25th of February, 1834, Carlyle wrote to his brother John: "We learned incidentally last week that Grace, our servant, though 'without fault to us,' and whom we, with all her inertness, were nothing but purposing to keep, had resolved on 'going home next summer.' The cup that had long been filling ran over with the smallest of drops. After meditating on it for a few minutes, we said to one another: 'Why not bolt out of all these sooty despicabilities, of Kerrags and lying draggle-tails of byre-women, and peat-moss and isolation and exasperation and confusion, and go at once to London?' Gedacht, gethan! Two days after we had a letter on the road to Mrs. Austin, to look out among the 'houses to let' for us, and an advertisement to Mac Diarmid to try for the letting of our own." Cattle, poultry, and various superfluities, were sold. Carlyle went on ahead, and was guided by the airy steps of Leigh Hunt, then a dweller in Upper Cheyne Row, Chelsea, to the house Number 5, Great Cheyne Row, which the new tenants soon made interesting to much of what was best in London (to much, also, Mrs. Oliphant has taken pains to say, of what was not the best), and eventually to the English-speaking world. The house was not taken until Mrs. Carlyle had inspected and approved it. A few days after the 10th of June, the date of their installation, Carlyle wrote to his mother: "We lie safe at a bend of the river, away from all the great roads; have air and quiet hardly inferior to Craigenputtock, an outlook from the back windows into mere leafy regions, with here and there a red high-peaked old roof looking through; and see nothing of London, except by day the summits of St. Paul's Cathedral and Westminster Abbey, and by night the gleam of the great Babylon affronting the peaceful skies. The house itself is probably the best we have ever lived in, a right old, strong, roomy brick-house, built near one hundred and fifty years ago, and likely to see three races of these modern fashionables fall before it comes down." It all sounds like a sunny backwater, but in truth the Carlyles had taken a very bold plunge into the world-sea. Their reserve of money could have been, at the utmost, no more than three hundred pounds; and the only personal sign of the times for them was the fact that the writer of Sartor — now coming out in chapters — was thought a literary maniac, and that Fraser feared the ruin of his magazine.

The household gods, however, once templed in Cheyne Row, were never carried back across the Border; nor, in fact, were they, in the half-century of life that remained to Carlyle, removed to any other spot. Here he caught the last glimpse of Edward Irving, the friend of his youth; here he welcomed Sterling, “a new young figure,” the closest friend of his middle life; and hither came to him Froude and Ruskin, his latest followers.

At first, in the chosen habitation, it was “desperate hope” and “bitter thrift.” The readers of Fraser’s Magazine received Sartor each month with renewed disgust. “Sartor,” said the publisher, “excites universal disapprobation.” While this passionate history of a soul, with its motive so strangely drawn from the Holy Bible and the great, unholy Dean, was waiting to touch the slow spirit of the British reading public, Carlyle — taking counsel of his necessities, his ambition, and his inspirations — applied himself to the history of the French Revolution. The first volume — as all the world knows — was lent in manuscript to Mill, who lent it to Mrs. Taylor, his “veevid” and “iridescent” Egeria, whose servant kindled fires with it. Carlyle had not been offered, as he thought he should have been, the editorship of the new London and Westminster Review; and Mill, for fear of his father, did not dare even to give him work to do for it. Carlyle himself had refused to sell his independence to the Times. There was thus nothing for it but to rewrite the burnt volume, of which he had kept no notes. With such vigor did he drive his mind and his pen that the lost chapters were restored by September 22, 1835. Mill had told him of the loss on the 6th of the preceding March. Mrs. Carlyle wrote to her sister-in-law, Mrs. Aitken, in August: “I do not think that the second version is, on the whole, inferior to the first; it is a little less vivacious, perhaps, but better thought and put together. One chapter more brings him to the end of his second ‘first volume,’ and then we shall sing a Te Deum and get drunk; for which, by the way, we have unusual facilities at present, a friend (Mr. Wilson) having yesterday sent us a present of a hamper (some six or seven pounds' worth) of the finest old Madeira wine."

Better yet than wine was an American edition of Sartor, godfathered by Emerson, to the number of five hundred copies. This was in April, 1836, and another edition was soon demanded. Carlyle amused himself by quoting the book, in his essay on Mirabeau, as the work of a New England writer.

"The Doctor," mentioned in the letter to follow, was Carlyle's brother John, who, thanks to Jeffrey, had been for some years traveling physician to Lady Clare. "Anne Cook" was an Annandale servant whom Carlyle brought with him on his return from Scotsbrig, in October, 1835. Mrs. Carlyle wrote of Anne Cook, "She amuses me every hour of the day with her perfect incomprehension of everything like ceremony;" and several of her homespun sayings became proverbs in Cheyne Row. "Short," as Carlyle uses it in writing to his sister, has apparently the meaning often attached to it in New England, — "short of temper." The whole sentence bears a quizzing reference to the year before, when, on the 4th of June, Carlyle had written: "Alick, writing to me yesterday, mentions among other things that you are shorted (as he phrases it) because I have not written. . . . Do not you shorten, my dear little Bairn, but lengthen, and know that if you take anything amiss, it is for mere want of seeing how it really was; that of all delusions Satan could tempt you with, that of wanting my brotherly affection, now and always while we inhabit the Earth together, is the most delusive." And on the 23d of December: "Do not shorten, but lengthen."

The "second volume" is, of course, the second volume of The French Revolution. Of both first and second Carlyle had written more vehemently to Emerson, a few weeks before: "I got the fatal First Volume finished (in the miserablest way, after great efforts) in October last; my head was all in a whirl; I fled to Scotland and my Mother for a month of rest. Rest is nowhere for the Son of Adam; all looked so 'spectral' to me in my old-familiar Birthland; Hades itself could not have seemed stranger; Annandale also was part of the kingdom of Time. Since November I have worked again as I could; a second volume got wrapped up and sealed out of my sight within the last three days. There is but a Third now: one pull more, and then! It seems to me, I will fly into some obscurest cranny of the world, and lie silent there for a twelvemonth. The mind is weary, the body is very sick; a little black speck dances to and fro in the left eye (part of the retina protesting against the liver, and striking work). I cannot help it; it must flutter and dance there, like a signal of distress, unanswered till I be done. My familiar friends tell me farther that the Book is all wrong, style, cramp, &c., &c. My friends, I answer, you are very right; but this also, Heaven be my witness, I cannot help. — In such sort do I live here; all this I had to write you, if I wrote at all.”

The contrast between such a passage and the whole letter to his sister is but one of a multitude of instances that show the change in Carlyle's spirit whenever he sat down to write to his home people.

II. CARLYLE TO MRS. HANNING, MANCHESTER.

5 CHEYNE ROW, CHELSEA, LONDON,
16th May, 1836.

MY DEAR JENNY, — Your letter has been here several weeks, a very welcome messenger to us, and I did not think at the time I should have been so long in answering it. But I have been drawn hither and thither by many things, of late ; besides, I judged that Robert and you were happy enough of yourselves for the present, and did not much need any foreign aid or interruption. I need not assure you, my dear little Jenny, of the interest I took in the great enterprise you had embarked on ; of my wishes and prayers that it might prove for the good of both. On the whole, I can say that, to my judgment, it looks all very fair and well. You know I have all along regarded Hanning as an uncommonly brisk, glegg little fellow since the first time I saw him (hardly longer than my leg, then), and prophesied handsome things of him in the world. It is very rare and very fortunate when two parties that have affected each other from childhood upwards get together in indissoluble partnership at last. May it prove well for you, as I think it will. You must take the good and the ill in faithful mutual help, and, whoever or whatever fail you, never fail one another. I have no doubt Robert will shift his way with all dexterity and prudence thro' that Cotton Babylon, looking sharp about him ; knowing always, too, that "honesty is the best policy" for all manner of men. Do thou faithfully second him, my bairn : that will be the best of lots for thee.

I think it possible that now and then, especially when you are left alone, the look of so many foreign things may seem dispiriting to you, and the huge smoke and stour of that tumultuous Manchester (which is not unlike the uglier parts of London) produce quite other than a pleasant impression. But take courage, my woman, "you will use, you will use," and get hefted to the place, as all creatures do. There are many good people in that vast weaving-shop, many good things among the innumerable bad. Keep snug within your own doors, keep your own hearth snug; by and by you will see what is worth venturing out for. Have nothing to do with the foolish, with the vain and ill-conducted. Attach yourself to the well-living and sensible, to every one from whom you find there is real benefit derivable. Thus, by degrees a desirable little circle will form itself around you; you will feel that Manchester is a home, as all places under the heavenly sun here may become for one.

In a newspaper you would notice that the Doctor was come. Till this day, almost, there was little else to be said about him than that he was here and well. He has been speculating and enquiring as to what he should do, and now has determined that London practice will not do for the present; that he should go back with his Lady and try again to get practice there. He is gone out this moment to make a bargain to that effect. They are to set out for Rome again on the first of September; from that till the first of March the Doctor is Lady Clare's doctor, but lives in his own lodging at Rome; after that he is free to do whatsoever he will: to stay there, if they seem inviting; to return home, if otherwise. I believe, myself, that he has decided wisely. Till September, then, we have him amongst us. He talks of being "off in a week or two" for Scotland; he charged me to say that he would see Manchester, and you, either as he went or as he returned. It is not much out of the way, if one go by Carlisle (or rather, I suppose, it is directly in the way), or even if one go by Liverpool, but I rather think he will make for Newcastle this time; to which place we have a steamboat direct. This is a good season for steamboats, and a bad one for coaches; for with latter, indeed, what good season is there? Nothing in the world is frightfuller to me of the travelling rout, than a coach on a long journey. It is easier by half to walk it with peas (at least boiled peas) in your shoes, were not the time so much shorter. The Doctor looks very well and sonsy ; he seems in good health and well to live ; the only change is that his head is getting a shade of grey (quite ahead of mine, though I am six years older), which does not mis-seem him, but looks very well.

We had a long speculation about going to Scotland, too, but I doubt we must renounce it. This summer I have finished my second volume, but there is still the third to do, and I must have such a tussle with it ! All summer I will struggle and wrestle, but then about the time of the gathering in of sheaves I too shall be gathering in. Jane has gone out to " buy a cotton gown," for the weather is, at last, beautiful and warm. Before going she bade me send you both her best wishes and regards, prayers for a happy pilgrimage together. She has been but poorly for a good while (indeed, all the world is sick with these east winds and perpetual changes), but will probably be better now.

Jack and I, too, have both had our colds. Then Anne Cook fell sick, almost dangerously sick for the time ; but Jack was there and gave abundant medical help ; so the poor creature is on her feet again, and a great trouble of confusion is rolled out of doors thereby.

I am writing to our Mother this day. I have heard nothing from that quarter since the letter that informed me the poor little child was dead. Jean wrote part of it herself, and seemed in a very composed state, keeping her natural sorrow courageously down. Our Mother, I believe, continues there till Jean be ill again, and we hope happily well. Whether there be a frank procurable to-day I know not, but I will try. At worst I will not wait, lest you grow impatient again and get short. If you knew what a fizz I am kept in with one thing and another! Write to me when you have time to fill a sheet,—news, descriptions of how you get on, what you suffer and enjoy, what you do: these are the best. I will answer. Send an old newspaper from time to time, with two strokes on it, if you are well. Promise, however, to write instantly if you are ill. Then shall we know to keep ourselves in peace.

Farewell, dear little Sister. Give our love to our new Brother. Tell him to walk wisely and be a credit to your choice. God be with you both.

T. CARLYLE.

In Carlyle's Journal for June 1 occur these words: —

“An eternity of life were not endurable to any mortal. To me the thought of it were madness even for one day. Oh! I am far astray, wandering, lost, ‘dyeing the thirsty desert with my blood in every footprint.’ Perhaps God and His providence will be better to me than I hope. Peace, peace! words are idler than idle.

“I have seen Wordsworth again. I have seen Landor, Americans, Frenchman-Cavaignac the Republican. Be no word written of them. Bubble bubble, toil and trouble. I find emptiness and chagrin, look for nothing else, and on the whole can reverence no existing man, and shall do well to pity all, myself first, — or rather, last. To work, therefore. That will still me a little, if aught will.”

Presently the household purse became so shrunken that the Revolution had to be dropped for two weeks, while Carlyle wrote the article on Mirabeau. This — printed first in Mill's Review, and afterward in the Miscellanies — brought in about fifty pounds. Mrs. Carlyle, meanwhile, became so ill that it was arranged for her to go home to her mother. The voyage part of the plan, — by steamer from Liverpool to Annan, — which had been merely for economy, was not carried out. Mrs. Carlyle's Liverpool uncle, John Welsh, paid her fare in the coach to Dumfries, and gave her a handsome shawl as a present for her birthday, the 14th of July.

III. CARLYLE TO MRS. HANNING, MANCHESTER.

CHELSEA, 8th July, Friday, 1836.

DEAR JENNY, — I write you a few words in the greatest haste, with a worthy Mr. Gibson even talking to me all the while; but I must write, for there is not a post to lose, and I think the news will not be unwelcome to you.

Jane is getting ill again in this fiercely hot weather, and I have persuaded her to go home for a month to her mother. She is going by Manchester, and you. Off some time tomorrow (Saturday), and will be in your town, we calculate, on Sunday, and hopes to sleep in your house that night. This is the news. Now we know not as yet by what coach she will come, or at what hour and what Inn she will arrive, but this Mr. Gibson, who has undertaken to go out and search over the city for the suitablest vehicle, and to engage a seat in that for her, will take this letter in his pocket. He, having engaged the seat, will mark the name of it on the outside (where see). I judge farther that this letter will reach you on Saturday evening or next morning soon, so that there will be time. The rest you will know how to do without telling. I think Robert, if he be not altered from what he was, will succeed in meeting the tired wayfarer as she steps out, which will be a great comfort to her. She calculates on being at full liberty to sit silent with you, or to sit talking, to lie down on the bed, to do whatsoever she likes best to do, and to be in all senses at home as in her own home. There are few houses in England that could do as much for her. I think she would like best to be — “well let alone.”

Next day, or when once right rested, Robert will conduct her to the Liverpool Railway, and give her his “Luck by the road;” after which she has but a little whirl, a little sail, — by the force of steam both ways, — and is at Templand or Annan. She will tell you all our news and get all yours, so I need not add another word. Did you get a frank that I sent you some months ago? Did you ever send even a newspaper since? Jane has half a thought that she may find the Doctor and our mother with you. All good wishes to your Goodman.

Yours, my dear Jenny, affectionately,
T. CARLYLE.

IV. TO MRS. HANNING, MANCHESTER, FROM HER MOTHER, IN SCOTSBRIG.

November 3, 1836.

DEAR JENNY, — I have long had a mind to write you, but have put off, as you see, till now, and though I have nothing worth while to say but to tell you of my welfare, which I know you are still glad to hear. I have been very well since you left me, though I have taken no medicine of any kind. You will be ready to say, “What have you been doing all this time?” I have been very throng in my own way. I have spun a little web of droget and done many odd things.

We have got another fine little boy here last Monday morning. Isabella is doing well.

They have had a long and sore fight with the harvest. It is nearly finished. It is a good crop, and upon the whole no great damage is done. We had a bitter snow and frost last week; it is gone again, however, but the weather is still coarse, with good days among.

I had a long letter from London about the time I got yours with the socks, which are very comfortable indeed. I have them on at this moment, and my feet are as warm as pie. Many thanks to the giver. The iron is likewise an excellent one, a perfect conceit. Many, many thanks.

I was sorry to hear of your lassie turning out so badly. She had too much confidence. One should trust them no farther than they see. Old James of the hill is just come up for some beasts of Alick's. He talks of taking them over the water to sell them soon. So you will perhaps have a visit of him soon.

You must not be long in writing to me, my good bairn, and tell me how you are coming on. Are you anything healthy now? I intend visiting you, if I be well. Afterward it will be the next year before I think of coming. They were all well at London when I got their letter. John was at Geneva. I long to hear from him, and to know where he is now. I am expecting word daily. The rest are all well, for aught I know; but Jamie is at Annan to-day, and he will hear of them all, as Alick was at Dumfries yesterday.

Your folk are all well. I saw William Hanning last week at the market with John. He told me he had sent away a letter that day, I think, to you. I forgot to tell you how Tom is getting on with his book. He intends going to press about New Year's Day. It will be a fine time for him. May we all go on in the strength of God, the Lord, making mention of His righteousness, even of His only, trusting in Him for all we need for time and for eternity. I had done, but have just got a letter from the good Doctor, wrote about a fortnight since. If he is well, he is near Rome by this time.

Write, for I can write none. Send me a long letter. No more.

From your own mother,

M. A. CARLYLE.

They are all well at Annan and Dumfries.

Friday. I believe Alick goes off for Liverpool to-day. Send me word when to come over, and write soon.

By the end of October, 1836, Carlyle was already wondering what he should do after finishing The French Revolution, and wrote to his brother John: "Here, with only literature for shelter, there is, I think, no continuance. Better to take a stick in your hand, and roam the earth Teufelsdröckhish; you will get at least a stomach to eat bread, — even that denied me here.” On the evening of the 12th of January, 1837, the book was finished which raised Carlyle from obscurity — so far as the public was concerned — to an undisputed place among great writers. Though popularity did not come for many a year, fame attended him from this point onward. The French Revolution was not published, however, until June; and in the interim Carlyle’s circumstances looked little more promising than before. A week after he had finished the last sentence, and handed the manuscript to his wife with a since famous and often-quoted speech, he found time and spirits to send prescriptions of cheerfulness to Mrs. Hanning. The “two strokes” of a pen on a newspaper signified to the Carlyle who received the paper that all was well with the Carlyle who sent it.

V. CARLYLE TO MRS. HANNING, MANCHESTER.

5 CHEYNE ROW, CHELSEA, LONDON,
19th Jan’y, 1837.

MY DEAR JENNY, — It is a long time since I heard directly of you at any length, or since you heard of me. To-day, tho’ I have not the best disposition or leisure, I will send you a line : there are no franks going, but the post is always going, and you will think a shilling might be worse spent.

We are very sorry, and not without our anxieties, at the short notice Robert sent us on the Newspaper ; however, the next week brought confirmation on the favourable side, and I persuade myself to hope that all is getting round again to the right state. Your health is evidently not strong ; but you are growing in years, and have naturally a sound constitution ; you must learn to take care and precautions, especially in the life you are now entered upon, in that huge den of reek and Cotton-fuz, where one cannot go on as in the free atmosphere of the Country. Exercise, especially exercise out of doors when it is convenient, is the best of all appliances. Do not sit motionless within doors, if there is a sun shining without, and you are able to stir. Particularly endeavour to keep a good heart, and avoid all moping and musing, whatever takes away your cheerfulness. Sunshine in the inside of one is even more important than sunshine without.

I do not understand your way of life so well as to know whether the Goodman is generally at your hand ; in that case, you have both a duty to do, and society in the doing of it independently of others; but, at all events, frank communication with one's fellow-creatures is a pleasure and a medicine which no life should be without. Be not solitary, be not idle! That is a precept of old standing. Doing one's duties (and all creatures have their solemn duties to do), living soberly, meekly, "walking humbly before God," one has cause to hope that it will be well with him, that he shall see good in the world. Write me a letter, full of all your concerns and considerations, when you can muster disposition. I shall always be right glad of such a message. In fine, I hope the spring weather will come and set us all up a little.

Before going farther, let me mention here that a Newspaper came to me last Monday, charged nineteen shillings and some pence! I, of course, refused it. I got a sight of it, but could not ascertain accurately from whom it was. Either Alick or your Robert, I thought, but the Post people had stamped it, and sealed it, and smeared it all over, and marked it "Written on," so that I could make little of it. The cover, I noticed, was in writing paper scored with blue lines: it strikes me it may have been the Manchester paper, after all, and no writing in it but the copper-plate on a piece of one of Robert's account papers. At all events, when any more Newspapers come, the law is that the cover be of vacant blank paper; likewise we will cease writing or marking except two strokes on the cover, lest we get into trouble by it. I refused this nineteen shillings fellow; and they will be able to make no more of it, but it will make them more watchful in future. I mean to write into Annandale to the like effect.

The Doctor sends me word out of Rome that he wants a Dumfries Herald forwarded to him thither. I have not yet arranged that; but I am thinking of having this Herald (if the days answer) sent by Manchester, thro' your hands. I think it would reach you on Saturday. You could look at it, and send it on, the same day, whereby no time at all would be lost. The two strokes would always be a satisfaction. We shall see how it answers. If any such Herald, then, come your way, you know what to do with it.

It is several weeks since I had any direct tidings out of Scotland, except what James Aitken's address of the Courier gives me: it had the sign of well-being on it last week. I am to write thither shortly, having a letter of the Doctor's lying here, as I have hinted. The Doctor says he had written a few days before to our Mother, which has made me less anxious about speed with this to her. He is well and doing tolerably well, — getting what Practice in Rome a beginner can expect. The Cholera was about gone from Naples, and the panic of it from Rome, so that more English were coming in, and he hoped to do still better. You can send this news into the Scotch side when you have opportunity.

All people here have got a thing they call Influenza, a dirty, feverish kind of cold; very miserable, and so general as was hardly ever seen. Printing-offices, Manufactories, Tailor-shops, and such like are struck silent, every second man lying snifftering in his respective place of abode. The same seems to be the rule in the North, too. I suppose the miserable temperate of climate may be the cause. Worse weather never fell from the Lift, to my judgment, than we have here. Reek, mist, cold, wet; the day before yesterday there was one of our completest London fogs, — a thing of which I suppose you even at Manchester can form no kind of notion. For we are exactly ten times as big as you are, and parts of us are hardly less reeky and dirty; farther, we lie flat, on the edge of a broad river: and now suppose there were a mist, black enough, and such that no smoke or emanation could rise from us, but fell again the instant it had got out of the chimney-head! People have to light candles at noon, coaches have torch-bearers running at the horses' heads. It is like a sea of ink. I wonder the people do not all drop down dead in it, — since they are not fishes, of a particular sort. It is cause enough for Influenza. Poor Jane, who misses nothing, has caught fast hold of this Sunday last, and has really been miserably ill. She gets better these last two days, but is weak as water; indeed, the headache at one time was quite wretched. She has been, on the whole, stronger since you saw her, but is not at all strong. As for myself, I have felt these wretched fogs penetrating into me, with a clear design to produce cough; but I have set my face against it and said No. This really does a great deal, and has served me hitherto. I hope to escape the Influenza; they say it is abating.

The Book is done, about a week ago: this is my best news. I have got the first printed sheet, since I sat down to write this. We shall go on swiftly, it is to be hoped, and have it finished and forth into the world, say, before the month of March end. I care little what becomes of it then; it has been a sore Book to me. There are two things I was printing lately, which I would send to you, but there is no conveyance. I fear you would do little good with them, at any rate; not five shillings' worth of good, which they would cost you. Besides, if Robert or you want to see them, you can let him go to a Circulating Library and ask for the last Number of the London and Westminster Review. In it he will find a thing called Memoirs of Mirabeau: that thing is mine. The other thing is in Fraser's Magazine, — half of it; the other half will be in the February Number: it is called Diamond Necklace.

This latter was written at Craigenputtock a good while ago. I see your Manchester Editor feels himself aggrieved by it, worthy man, but hints that there may be some mistake on his part; which I do very seriously assure him is my opinion, too. Other Editors, it would seem, sing to the same tune.

After this Book is printed, it remains uncertain what I shall do next. One thing I am firmly enough resolved on : not to spend the summer here. I will have myself rested, and see the fields green and the sky blue yet one year, follow what may. Many things call me towards Scotland ; but nothing can yet be determined upon. If I go Northward, Manchester is a likely enough step for me ; nay, perhaps the Doctor may be home from Rome, and we shall both be there ! Nothing is yet fixed ; we will hope all this.

And now, my dear Sister, I must bid thee good day. Salute Robert from me with all manner of good wishes. I have known him as a “ fell fellow ” since he was hardly longer than my leg. Tell him to be diligent in business, and also (for that is another indispensable thing) fervent in spirit, struggling to serve God. Make thou a good wife to him, helping him in all right things by counsel and act. Good be with you both ! Jane sends you all good wishes from her sick bed, and “ was grieved to hear of what had happened you.” She will be better in a day or two.

Your affectionate Brother,

T. CARLYLE.

The next letter, "a holy and a cheerful note" from Margaret Carlyle to her daughter, falls of necessity between 1836 and 1840, the year of Mrs. Hanning's going to Manchester and that of her leaving it. The statement that "Tom . . . has to begin to lecture the first of May, and has no time to prepare," points to 1837; for all the following courses Carlyle had time to make ready. This first series, with German Literature for subject, was suddenly arranged by a number of Carlyle's friends, — Miss Martineau zealous among them, — in the fear that, unless things brightened for him, he would be forced to leave London, "and perhaps England." The lectures were a great success; Carlyle spoke, instead of reading, to "an audience of Marchionesses, Ambassadors, ah me! and what not;" and the resulting sum of one hundred and thirty-five pounds, with the promise of another course for the next season, settled the household gods more firmly on their pedestals. In the words of Mrs. Carlyle, "Nothing that he has ever tried seems to me to have carried such conviction to the public heart that he is a real man of genius, and worth being kept alive at a moderate rate."

VI. TO MRS. HANNING, MANCHESTER, FROM HER MOTHER.

SCOTSBRIG, April 9th [1837].

DEAR JENNY,—I have nothing worth writing at this time. We are all in our usual health. I have had little Grace with me these three weeks. Now I have to go to Dumfries this week to put some money in the bank for John, your brother. It is at Dumfries by this time. I told Mary to bid you write me soon and tell me how you are coming on. If you have not written, write to Dumfries. Do you know that Jane has been very badly? She is rather better. Thank God, her mother is there with them. She took a coach and went straight for London. Tom is in a great hubbub at this time: you will know he has to begin to lecture the first of May, and has no time to prepare. May God be with him and all of us, and as our day is so may our strength be, and may He prepare us for whatever He see meet to come in our way, that it may be for His glory and our good in the end. Our time is short at longest: may we have grace given us to improve it.

I had no thought of writing at this time, but Fanny Caruthers called and told me she was going to Manchester. She is much altered: I did not know her. Now, Jenny, I intend to see you this summer; I cannot say when, but if health permit I will come. If I am long in coming, I can stay the longer: it depends on Tom when he comes home. It will be June at the soonest before he can get away. I had a letter from him shortly which troubled me not a little, telling of Jane's illness. She is rather better, but still confined to her bed at last accounts, which was about a week ago. I had a letter of John: he was well then. Write soon and tell me how you keep your health, now this cold weather is come, and how is Robert. Thank him in my name for nursing you so well when you were poorly. I hope you are stout now. Take good care of yourself and be well when I come over. I long to see you both. I will add no more, but am still

Your loving mother,

MARGARET A. CARLYLE.

God be with us all, and bless us, and do us good.

Clap your thumbs on mistakes.

On the 7th of June Carlyle wrote to Sterling, "I cannot say a word to you of the book or of the lectures, except that by the unspeakable blessing of Heaven they are finished." "A few days after the date of this letter," says Froude, "Carlyle fled to Scotland, fairly broken down." That he lingered a fortnight longer in Chelsea, however, the following letter is witness.

VII. CARLYLE TO MRS. HANNING, MANCHESTER.

5 CHEYNE ROW, CHELSEA, LONDON.
20th June, 1837.

MY DEAR JENNY, — I write to-day with one of the worst of pens and in the extreme hurry of packing, to say that I am just coming off for Annandale, and shall take Lancashire in my way. I think of taking the steamboat to-morrow morning for Hull. After that, I believe we go by Leeds and then to Manchester, where I hope to find you and your Goodman well. The times and the distances after getting to Hull, as we hope on Thursday, are unknown to me. Most probably, I should think, it will be on Saturday that I get to you, but it may be the day after, it may be the day before, for all is yet uncertain; nay, there is a certain Dr. Hunter in Leeds, a cousin of Jane's, with whom I may (though that is not very likely) loiter an hour or two. We shall see. We shall hope to meet all in order some how or other at last.

Jane is to stay here till I come back, her mother keeping her company. Jane, as you perhaps know, has been very ill. She has now grown much stronger again, but still not strong enough. Her mother hastily joined us when things were at the worst in the month of April, and will not quit us till we get together again.

I am not very eminently well at present, yet neither is anything special gone wrong with me. I want rest, and mean to have that now at Scotsbrig. I have got my book completely done. I gave a course of lectures too, &c., &c., and have "got all by" for the present. I seem to myself to require a little while of repose as the one thing needful.

A newspaper came the other day from the Doctor, indicating that he was well. He is not in Rome through the Summer, but in a place called Albano, not far from Rome. He seemed to consider it as not unlikely that he might be here in September again. He had succeeded pretty well at Rome as a Practitioner.

Last time I heard from Annandale our Mother and all the rest were well. It is not very long since, — some three weeks or little more. They also reported well of you at Manchester.

Give my compliments to Robert. Say I mean to ask his assistance in buying a quantity of breeches, as I pass through that huge Weaving-shop of the World. I ought to get them there better than elsewhere.

Let us hope, therefore, that on Saturday, or some time near before or near after that day, I shall succeed in finding you at Bank Street and finding all right.

I have not a moment's time more. Indeed, what more is there to be said at present with such a pen?

I remain always, my dear sister,

Your affectionate

T. CARLYLE.

James Carlyle was now with his mother, farming Scotsbrig for her. Alick did afterward go to America, and died there. "John of Cocker-mouth" was a half-brother. "James Austin and Mary" are Carlyle's brother-in-law and sister.

VIII. CARLYLE TO MRS. HANNING, MANCHESTER.

SCOTSBRIG, 18th July, 1837.

MY DEAR JENNY, — According to promise, I set about writing you a word of Scotch news, now that I am fairly settled here and know how things are. The railway train whirled me away from you rapidly that evening. Next evening, about the same hour, we were getting out of Liverpool harbour, and on the following morning, between seven and eight o'clock, I had got my eye upon Alick waving to me from the end of the Jetty at Annan. It is almost three weeks now that I have been here and found all well, but it was only the day before yesterday that we got our first visit to Dumfries made out, and could rightly report about matters there. I fancied a newspaper with two strokes would communicate the substance of what was to be said in the interim.

There has been a good deal of discussion about Alick and his going to America. He himself seemed of mind to go, but not very strongly or hopefully set on it. Our Mother, again, was resolute against it, and made such a lamenting as was sufficient to dishearten one more inclined than he. So now I think it seems fixed so far as that he will not go. What he is to do here one does not so well see, but it will evidently be a great point gained for him that he give up thinking about departure, and direct his whole industry to ascertaining how he can manage here where he is. Men of far less wit than he do contrive to manage, when once they have set their heart on it. Jamie is quite ready to go to Puttock and give up Scotsbrig to him, but I still rather think there will nothing come of that; nay, some think Alick himself does not at bottom wish that, but is satisfied with finding Jamie so far ready to accommodate him and keep him at home. He seems very tranquil, cheerfuller than he was and altogether steady; likelier to have a little fair luck than he was a while ago. He must persist where he is. There is nothing that can prosper without perseverance. Perseverance will make many a thing turn out well that looked ill enough once. John of Cockermouth is gone off to America about a fortnight ago with all his family. I got him a letter from Burnswark to a brother of his at New York. I doubt not he will do well. Clow of Land has his property advertised for sale; means to be off about the end of August, which also

I reckon prudent. With two or three thousand pounds in his pocket and four or five strong sons at his back, a man may make a figure in America. James Austin and Mary were at one time talking of America, but they also have given it up.

We had a letter from the Doctor shortly after my arrival here. He is well, living at Albano, a summer residence some twenty miles from Rome. He speaks of it being possible, or probable, that he may get back to England in September, but it is not certain. He will be pretty sure to come by Manchester and you if he come Northward. The rest, as I have already hinted, are all well and following their usual course. Jamie and his wife and two sons go along very briskly. His crops look well. He had his Peat-stack up (and mother's little one beside it) and his hay mown, though the late rains and thunder have retarded that a little. The country never looked beautifuller in my remembrance, green and leafy; the air is fresh, and all things smiling and rejoicing and growing. Austin is busy enough now with work. He had a bad time of it in spring, when horse provender was so dear. The children are well, — even the eldest looks better than I expected, — and Mary, their mother, seems hearty and thrifty. I mentioned that we had been at Dumfries. Alick took up our Mother and me on Friday last in a rough “Dandycart” of Mrs. Scott’s with a beast of Jamie’s. One of the first questions my Mother asked of Jean was, “Hast thou had any word from Jenny?” To which the answer was “No.” Jean’s child is running about quite brisk, though a little thinner than it once was; from teeth, I suppose. James Aitken has plenty of work, three or four journeymen. In short, they seem doing well. Finally, Jamie (Maister Cairlill) authorizes me to report that he this day met with a brother of thy Robert’s, who said that the Peat-knowes too were all well. The day after my arrival here I fell in with William Hanning, the father, on Middlebie Brae, measuring some Dykes, I think, with a son of Pottsfowns. He looked as well as I have seen him do. The same man as ever, though he must be much older than he once was. The tea parcel was forwarded to him, or sent for, by my desire, that same night.

Our good Mother here is quite well in health; indeed, as well every way as one could expect, though doubtless she is a little lonelier now than when you were with her. She complains of nothing, but does her endeavour to make the best of all things. She wishes you "to write very soon and tell her how the world is serving you." She would have sent a word or two to that effect in her own hand, she says, but "having a good clerk" (me, namely) "she does not need." I am to confirm her promise of coming with me when I return southward, and staying till you tire of her. There was word from Jane on Sunday gone a week. She wrote in haste, but at great length, and seemed very cheerful. She will not come hither this time, I think. Her mother is to return home about the end of this month. Jane appears quite prepared to stay by herself. She has some friends yonder whom she is much with, and she rather likes the treat. Mrs. Welsh expects Liverpool people with her to Templand, and can stay no longer.

I have ended my paper, dear Jenny, and given one of the meagrest outlines of our news. You will see, however, that nothing is going wrong with us; that we are thinking of you and desirous to hear from you. Be a good bairn and a good wife, and help your Goodman faithfully in all honest things. He is a thrifty fellow with a good whole heart. There is no danger of him. Help one another. Be good to one another. God's blessing with you both. All here salute you.

I am always

Your affectionate brother,

T. CARLYLE.

Meantime, while Jamie was building his peat-stack in "the beautifullest weather" that Carlyle had ever seen, Alick was setting up a shop in the village of Ecclefechan, and The French Revolution was beginning to take the English-reading world for its parish. The French verdict was for the most part adverse. Mérimée, whether or not he agreed with the translators in describing Carlyle as le phénomène d'un protestant poétique, expressed a sincere desire to throw the writer out of the window. But Dickens carried the book about with him, Southey read it six times running, and Mill, approving his opposite, maintained that the much berated style was of high excellence. Carlyle, wishing to "lie vacant," neither read nor so much as saw many of the reviews, though he heard of most of them. One untactful friend sent him the opinion of a certain critical journal, with which he forthwith "boiled his teakettle." Much more than a pot-boiler was one enthusiastic review, although that function of his article was sadly important to the writer, for whom Vanity Fair and fame were still ten years ahead. Writes Carlyle to his brother: "I understand there have been many reviews of a very mixed character. I got one in the Times last week. The writer is one Thackeray, a half-monstrous Cornish giant, kind of painter, Cambridge man, and Paris newspaper correspondent, who is now writing for his life in London. I have seen him at the Bullers' and at Sterling's. His article is rather like him, and I suppose calculated to do the book good."

One adds involuntarily: —

"Brigadier, répondit Pandore, Brigadier, vous avez raison."

Without regard to reviewers, and in spite of the cholera, the homely idyl goes melodiously on. "Jean and her two Jamies" are Carlyle's sister, Mrs. Aitken, her husband and little son. "Jamie of Scotsbrig" is, of course, Carlyle's brother. Betty Smail's short history may be found in Froude's First Forty Years of Carlyle, vol. i. p. 119.

IX. CARLYLE TO MRS. HANNING, MANCHESTER.

SCOTSBRIG, ECCLEFECHAN,
28 Aug. 1837.

DEAR JENNY, — Your letter to Mary at Annan got this length on Saturday night. As you appear to be impatient for news from this quarter, not unreasonably, having had none for six weeks, I am appointed to write you a few lines without any loss of time whatever, — a thing I can easily enough do, being even idler to-day than common.

We were not so well pleased to hear of your fecklessness and pain in the stomach during the last fortnight, but we hope it is but something derived from the season and will not continue. There is very often a kind of “British Cholera” in this harvest time. It is even very frequent at present in this region, owing partly to the air (as they say), and chiefly, perhaps, to the new potatoes and other imperfectly ripened substances which people eat. Jamie, here, had a cast of it for two days just a week ago, rather sharp, but he is free now. Our Mother too was taken with it, — came home rather ill from Ecclefechan one day, — but by aid of Castor and some prime Brandy has got quite round again. You do not say that the disorder has got that length with you, but very probably it is something related to the same business. The only remedy is to be careful of what one eats, to take due moderate exercise in the open air, in case of extremity employing a little medicine. Cold, especially cold feet are very bad ; but the great thing is to take care of one's self, especially to take care what one eats. New potatoes are very unwholesome for some people.

We are now all well here, and with the slight exception mentioned above have been so ever since I wrote last. Alick brought us news of you. Alick's news are the main ones I have now to send you. He quitted Annan on Monday last (this day gone a week), and has been in the Big house at Ecclefechan ever since. I suppose he explained to you and Robert the plan he had of setting up a shop there. He has gathered himself together, and is all alive after that same enterprise now. We had him and little Tom over here all yesterday. Mother, Jamie, and I walked with them to Cleughbrae in the evening. To-day, as we understand, he has got masons and actually broken in upon the house to repair it and arrange it for that object; Hale Moffet and his retinue having been got out. It is in a sad state of wreck, the poor house, but Alick expects to put a new face on it with great despatch indeed; and then, "shop drawers" and all the rest being provided, and James Aitken's brush having given the last touch to it, he will unfold his wares and try the thing in the name of Hope. We all pray heartily that it may prosper beyond his expectations. Ecclefechan is a sad Village: only last Friday night some blackguard broke 14 panes of the Meeting House windows. Fancy such an act of dastardly atrocity as that! But it lies in the centre of a tolerable country, too, and certain there is need of some good shop and honest Trader there.

I have seen Mary pretty frequently, the last time on Friday last. She is very well, and all her bairns are well. James has always some work, though seldom enough, and Mary is the brightest, thriftiest little creature that can be. They go on there as well as one could hope in these times. We had a letter from the Doctor, too: still in the same place, — Albano, near Rome; still well; uncertain as to his future movements or engagements, though it must be settled some way before this date, if we knew how. He seemed to think it very unlikely that he would be here in the present autumn, the likeliest of all that he would try to return next spring. The Cholera was in that country, but had not got to them. We fancy they will not fail to fly out of the road of it, if it advance too near.

I was at Dumfries since I wrote: up to Templand, and then again at Dumfries on my return. Mrs. Welsh came home several weeks ago, and had at the time I was up, and has still, her Liverpool friends with her. The house was very crowded. I was not very well, and stayed only four and twenty hours or so, cutting out my way in spite of all entreaties. Jean and her two Jamies are very tolerably well: the elder Jamie a thrifty, effectual, busy man; the younger as yet altogether silent, staggering and tripping about, — one of the gleggest little elves I have seen. There is talk of her coming down to Annan this very week to have the benefit of the tide for sea bathing. Jamie of Scotsbrig, who goes up to-morrow to pay his rent, will bring us word.

The other morning, walking out, I met Robert's father at the "Lengland's Nett," coming down from Dairlaw Hills with a row of bog-hay carts he had been buying at Dairlaw Hills. He was hale and well to look at, and reported all well. I suppose he has been very busy of late; seldom were so many roups seen in one season; all the farmers selling off, none of them having money for their rent day; Land farm, and now all the stock, crop, and household furniture have been sold off. Poor Clow goes off for America on Wednesday morning by the Liverpool steamer. People are all sorry. The Burnfoot Irvings, or Sandy Cowie for them, have bought his land: £4000.

Betty Smail, bound for Ecclefechan, has been waiting this half hour till I should be done; I did not know of her when I began. The needfulest thing, therefore, that I can do is to tell you about our coming. It will be soon, but is still uncertain when. I should say in about a fortnight, — nay, in a day or so less; but it depends somewhat on a letter we look for from Jane which has not yet come to hand. Jane, you must know, after her mother's departure went into the country with the Sterlings, friends of hers. I wish her to stay there while she likes, and would get home about the same time as she;

a month was the time she first spoke of, and that I have little doubt will suffice, — so my guess is as above given. A newspaper with one stroke on it will come to you (barring mistakes) two days before you are to look for us. This shall be a token, and we need not write any more. Alick has some talk of coming with us to get his goods ready then, but I think he will hardly be ready. The butter and another firkin of butter has been talked of and will be forthcoming, but it seems dubious whether any of it will get with us. It can come before or after, I believe safe and with little expense. Mother will bring “some pounds of it” in her box. I shall perhaps be obliged to go back by Liverpool, and must not calculate to stay more with you than a day. My Mother sends you both her love (she is smoking here); she “will tell you all her news” when we come. Compliments and good wishes to Robert from all of us. We are glad to hear his trade is better. A glegg fellow like him will get through worse troubles than this. God keep you, my dear little Jenny.

Your affectionate Brother,

T. CARLYLE.

X. TO MRS. HANNING, MANCHESTER, FROM HER MOTHER.[SCOTSBRIG] January 11th [1838].

DEAR CHILDREN, — I received your letter this day about mid-day. Then Alick and his family came here, so we talked on till bed-time ; and now they are gone to bed. I am sorry to hear that Jenny is poorly. I intend to see you very soon ; I cannot say pointedly which day yet. I am going down to Annan with Alick, and will fix. It shall not be long, God willing. I have some thoughts of taking the steamer. Keep up your heart, Jenny, and be well when I come. Trust in God, casting all your cares on Him. He is a kind father to all them that put their trust in Him. I will say no more to-night ; it is late. Do you think the railway is passable ?

I had not finished this scrawl when I received your last letter, of which I was very glad. It is all well, God's will be done. I was coming by the steamer on Thursday or Friday. Now I will let the storm blow by. Now, Jenny, be very careful of yourself ; take care of cold, and likewise what you eat. May God's blessing rest on us all. May He make us thankful for all His ways of dealing with us. Write soon. You may direct to Annan, as I will be there some time. Could you let Tom know that I am there, also, and that I am well? Now, bairns, write soon. You see I cannot write, though nobody would take greater pleasure in it.

Your own mother,

MARGARET A. C.

P. S. My tooth is better, though not very sound yet. I forgot to thank you very kindly for the things you sent me.

In the two ensuing years Carlyle gave two more courses of lectures, both notably successful. Among many other new acquaintances was Mr. Baring, afterward Lord Ashburton, who, with his two wives, was to figure so largely in the lives of Carlyle and his wife. Sartor Resartus was published in England, and republished in the United States. Chartism was written and printed. Other events of the same biennium were Mrs. Carlyle's "only Soirée," the appearance of Count d'Orsay in Cheyne Row, and Mr. Marshall's gift to Carlyle of a mare, — "Citoyenne" to be called.

After several visits in Scotland during the summer of 1838, Carlyle went home again to Scotsbrig. On his return thence, he spent a few days in Manchester with Mrs. Hanning. "He had been put to sleep in an old bed, which he remembered in his father's house." "I was just closing my senses in sweet oblivion," wrote he, "when the watchman, with a voice like the deepest groan of the Highland bagpipe, or what an ostrich corncraik might utter, groaned out Groo-o-o-o close under me, and set me all in a gallop again. Groo-o-o-o; for there was no articulate announcement at all in it, that I could gather. Groo-o-o-o, repeated again and again at various distances, dying out and then growing loud again, for an hour or more. I grew impatient, bolted out of bed, flung up the window. Groo-o-o-o. There he was advancing, lantern in hand, a few yards off me. 'Can't you give up that noise?' I hastily addressed him. 'You are keeping a person awake. What good is it to go howling and groaning all night, and deprive people of their sleep?' He ceased from that time — at least I heard no more of him. No watchman, I think, has been more astonished for some time back. At five in the morning all was as still as sleep and darkness. At half past five all went off like an enormous mill-race or ocean-tide. The Boom-m-m, far and wide. It was the mills that were all starting then, and creishy drudges by the million taking post there. I have heard few sounds more impressive to me in the mood I was in."

The following letter belongs to the time between the Hannings' departure from Manchester and Mr. Hanning's sailing for America. Kirtlebridge, where they were now living, is a few miles southeast of Ecclefechan. "The little 'trader,' " the "bit creeture," was probably Mrs. Hanning's first child, Margaret Aitken Carlyle, who was not yet two years old. The reference to the new penny post marks an era.

XI. CARLYLE TO MRS. HANNING, KIRTLEBRIDGE.

5 CHEYNE ROW, CHELSEA, LONDON,
7 Feb. 1840.

DEAR JENNY, — Had I known definitely how to address a word to you, I might surely have done so long before this. We have heard in general that you are stationed somewhere in the Village of Kirtlebridge or near it, and we fancy in general that your husband is struggling along with his old impetuosity. From yourself we have no tidings.

Pray, now that the Postage is so cheap, send us a pennyworth some day. I address this through Alick, fancying such may be the best way.

I enclose my last letter from the Doctor. I wrote to him the day before yesterday to his final destination. I calculate he may have got my letter to-day, — that is two days after his arrival. By that note all seems to be going well with him ; — we are all well here, as well as our wont is, and fighting along with printers, proof sheets &c, &c. Jane cannot regularly get out ; so horribly tempestuous, wet and uncertain is the weather, which keeps her still sickly, but she never breaks actually down. How is the little “trader,” as Jean or some of them call her ? I remember the “bit creature” very distinctly.

This is the worst year or among the worst for working people ever seen in man’s memory. Robert must not take this as a measure of his future success, but toil away steadfastly in sure hope of better times. It is well anyway that you are out of Manchester ; nothing there but hunger, contention and despair — added to the reek and dirt ! Be diligent and fear nothing.

Do you often run over to see our dear Mother in her Upper Room yonder? It will be a great comfort to her that she has you so near. Pray explain to me what part of the Village it is that you live in. I thought I knew it all, but I do not know Firpark Nook. Give my best wishes to your Goodman. Accept my thanks for your written remembrance, from one who always silently remembers you in his heart.

On April 23 of this year Carlyle wrote in his journal, "Miscellanies out, and Chartism second thousand." A month later he relieved his mother's anxiety about the last of his lectures on Heroes and Hero-Worship: "I contrived to tell them something about poor Cromwell, and I think to convince them that he was a great and true man, the valiant soldier in England of what John Knox had preached in Scotland. In a word, the people seemed agreed that it was my best course of lectures, this." Certainly his last course of lectures, this. He never spoke from a platform again till twenty-six years later, when, as Lord Rector, he addressed the students of Edinburgh University. He detested the "mixture of prophecy and play-acting." In the midst of his own work of making ready these final lectures for publication, Carlyle found time to push the London Library along. He thought England, as regarded its provision of books for the poor, in "a condition worthier of Dahomey than of England."

CARLYLE IN THE GARDEN OF 5 CHEYNE ROW, CHELSEA

July 20, 1857

Yet, in spite of this good and successful work for the library, Carlyle was of a mind to write, on July 3: "Alas! I get so dyspeptical, melancholic, half mad in the London summer: all courage to do anything but hold my peace fades away; I dwindle into the pusillanimity of the ninth part of a tailor, feel as if I had nothing I could do but 'die in my hole like a poisoned rat.'" He was apparently brought to the pitch of applying to himself this most terrible word of Swift's by the necessity of serving on a special jury. Let us set over against it what he said — never to be too often quoted — about a friend whom he found sitting smoking in the garden one evening, with Mrs. Carlyle: "A fine, large-featured, dim-eyed, bronze-coloured, shaggy-headed man is Alfred; dusty, smoky, free and easy, who swims outwardly and inwardly with great composure in an inarticulate element of tranquil chaos and tobacco smoke. Great now and then when he does emerge, — a most restful, brotherly, solid-hearted man." Taken together with what Tennyson himself called "the dirty monk" portrait, this probably gives a better picture of him than most of us could have made for ourselves with the eye of the flesh. Other, less welcome visitors came to Carlyle that summer, — among them a young woman from Boston, whom he called "a diseased rosebud." But America sent money as well as flowers, and the summer, according to Froude, brought the net result up to four hundred pounds.

By August, the lecture-writing now two thirds done, Carlyle, having so far taken no holiday, made a week's riding-tour in Sussex on the back of the gift-horse, Citoyenne. "Mrs. Carlyle described to us, some years after," says "the skilful biographer," "in her husband's presence, his setting out on this expedition; she drew him in her finest style of mockery, — his cloak, his knapsack, his broad-brimmed hat, his preparation of pipes, etc., — comparing him to Dr. Syntax. He laughed as loud as any of us, — it was impossible not to laugh; but it struck me, even then, that the wit, however brilliant, was rather untender."

On the eve of riding forth, Carlyle wrote to his mother. The Bullers, mentioned in the letter which follows, were the family of Charles Buller, to whom he had been tutor. Buller died eight years afterward, in the midst of a brilliant parliamentary career. The "clergyman" was probably the Rev. Julius Hare. I find no record of a visit to Erskine until three years later. Carlyle had written to his brother John, in the winter of 1838: "Did you ever see Thomas Erskine, the Scotch saint? I have seen him several times lately, and like him as one would do a draught of sweet rustic mead, served in cut glasses and a silver tray; one of the gentlest, kindest, best bred of men. He talks greatly about 'Symbols,' and other Teufelsdröckhiana; seems not disinclined to let the Christian religion pass for a kind of mythus, provided men can retain the spirit of it. . . . On the whole I take up with my old love for the Saints." And from that time Carlyle held much salutary communion with "St. Thomas," as Mrs. Carlyle used playfully to call him.

XII. CARLYLE TO HIS MOTHER, SCOTSBRIG.

CHELSEA, 1st August, 1840.

MY DEAR MOTHER, — Before setting out on' my long-talked-of excursion I must send you a word. I am to go to the Bullers' place to-morrow, a place near Epsom (the great race course) some eighteen miles of. I am to ride out with a Macintosh before my saddle and a small round trunk the size of a quartern loaf fastened behind, and no clothes upon me that bad weather will spoil. I shall be one of the most original figures! I mean to stay a day or two about Buller's, riding to and fro to see the fine green country. I have written to a clergyman, an acquaintance of mine on the South coast some 40 miles farther off: if he repeat the invitation he once gave me, perhaps I shall ride to him and see the place where William the Conqueror fought &c. and have one dip in the sea. I mean to be out in all about a week. The weather has grown suddenly bright. I calculate the sight of the green earth spotted yellow with ripe corn will do me good. After that I am to part with my horse: the expense of it is a thing I cannot but continually grudge. I think it will suit better henceforth to get rolled out on a railway some 20 miles, clear of all bricks and reek, to walk then for half a day, now and then, and so come home at night again. The expense of a horse every day here is nearer four than three shillings, far too heavy for a little fellow like me, whom even it does not make altogether healthy. I have offered to give the beast to Mr. Marshall (son of the original donor), who kept her for me last winter. I hope he will accept on my return. It will be much the handsomest way of ending the concern. If he refuses I think I shall sell. I meditated long on riding all the way up to Carlisle and you! But in the humor I am in, I had not heart for it. These Southern coasts too are a still newer part of England for me. I give up the riding Northward, but not the coming Northward yet, as you shall hear.

My Fourth Lecture was finished three days ago. On returning strong, as I hope to do a week hence, I will attack my two remaining lectures and dash them off speedily. The Town will be empty — none to disturb me. About the end of August I may hope to have my hands quite free, and then! Thomas Erskine invites me to Dundee &c. There are steamers, steam coaches, — I shall surely see you.

Alick's good letter gave me welcome tidings of you. I had read your own dear little epistle before. Heaven be praised for your welfare. I am glad to hear of "the peat-shed" and figure to myself the cauldron singing under your windows. I have written to-day to Jack. There had come a letter from Miss Elliott for him from the Isle of Wight: he once talked of settling there. I know not whether that is still in the wind again. He will have to decide about the Pellipar affair in three weeks or less.

To-day I enclose a little half sovereign. You must accept it merely to buy gooseberries: they are really very wholesome. I am to go into the City to send off some money for the Bank at Dumfries. I am in great haste. I will write again directly on my return if not sooner.

Alick's letter, tell him, was the pleasantest he has sent for many a day. I thank him much for it and will answer soon. I still owe Jamie a letter too: he is very patient, but shall be paid. Did you ever go near the sea again? This is beautiful weather for it now. It would do you and little Tom good, I think.

Jane still likes the warmth and salutes you all. Wish me a good journey! It is like to be a very brief and smooth one. Adieu, dear Mother.

Carlyle was disappointed in his hope of going home. He did not visit Scotsbrig again for another year.

So long before as January, 1839, Carlyle had written to his brother: "I have my face turned partly towards Oliver Cromwell and the Covenant time in England and Scotland." He continued to read and think much on the subject; and in the autumn of 1840 he wrote to Mr. Erskine: "I have got lately, not till very lately, to fancy that I see in Cromwell one of the greatest tragic souls we have ever had in this kindred of ours." But in this letter to his sister, as in so many another, there is no mention save of the close family kindred of the Carlyles: —

XIII. CARLYLE TO MRS. HANNING, KIRTLEBRIDGE.

5 CHEYNE ROW, CHELSEA, 7 October, 1840.

DEAR JENNY, — Will you take a word from me to-day in place of many hundreds which I wish I had the means of sending you? My time is very limited indeed, but the sight of my handwriting may be a kind of enlivener to your kind thoughts about me. My dear Mother tells me you are afraid sometimes I may have forgotten you. Believe that never, my dear little sister, it will forever be an error if you do! The whirl I am kept in here is a thing you can form no notion of, nor how natural or indeed inevitable it is for me to give up writing letters at all except when I am bound and obliged to do it. You have no lack of news from me; to my Mother at least I send abundant details. Did I not answer your letter too? I surely meant and ought to have done it. If at any time you wanted the smallest thing that I could do for you, and wrote about, I should be busier than I have ever yet been, if I did not answer. — In short, dear Jenny, whatever sins I may have, whatever more I may seem to have, try to think handsomely of them, to forgive them. And above all things, consider that whether I write many letters or few, my affection for you is a thing that will never leave me.

My Mother tells me frequently how good you are to her; what a satisfaction it is that you are so near her. I thank you a hundred times for your goodness to her; but I know you do not need my thanks or encouragement — and to me it is a real comfort to reflect that you, with your true heart and helpful hand, are always so near. Surely it is a duty for us all, and a blessing in the doing of it, to take care of our Mother, and promote her comfort by all means possible to us! I will love you better and better for this.

You would see by my Mother's last letter, where the Doctor is at present. I have heard nothing since I had a Newspaper from Dumfries, the other day, no letters. I mentioned that the box for Scotsbrig was to be sent off; it went accordingly and is now on the way to Liverpool, likely to be with you soon. There is a small parcel in it for you. We rejoice to hear that Robert prospers in his business: it is difficult to prosper in any business at present. A man of industry, sobriety, and steadiness of purpose; such a man has a chance if anybody have. Jane is certainly in better health this year than I have seen her for a good while. We wait to see what she will say to the cold weather! I myself am as well as usual; no great shakes of a wellness at any time. I expect to be busy, very busy this winter, which is the best consolation for all things. How I should like to hear of Jamie's harvest being all thatched! My love to my Mother, to Alick and all the rest. Jane unites with me in special remembrances to Robert and the glegg little lassie.

Yours, dear Jenny, in great haste, in all truth,
T. CARLYLE.

Late in November, Carlyle, "greatly against wont," went out to dinner. Among the people he met were "Pickwick" and old Rogers, "still brisk, courteous, kindly affectionate — a good old man, pathetic to look upon." Carlyle's acquaintances did not always grow in his favor, and six years later he said of Rogers: "I do not remember any old man (he is now eighty-three) whose manner of living gave me less satisfaction." In this winter of 1840-41, his dissatisfaction with things in general made him think at times of so desperate a move as retreating again to Craigenputtock. Still he kept on with the reading of "needful books." "He has had it in his head for a good while," said Mrs. Carlyle to a correspondent, on the 8th of January, 1841, "to write a 'life of Cromwell,' and has been sitting for months back in a mess of great dingy folios, the very look of which is like to give me locked-jaw."

Mrs. Hanning's second child, Mary, was born December 24, 1840.

XIV. CARLYLE TO MRS. HANNING, KIRTLEBRIDGE.

CHELSEA, 15th January, 1841.

DEAR JENNY, — We have heard very frequently from Alick of late about you, for which punctuality we are greatly obliged to him. You have had a bad turn, poor little Jenny, and we were all anxious enough to hear from day to day, as you may believe, how it went with you. Alick reports of late, yesterday in particular, that you are now considered out of danger, steadily getting better. We will hope and believe it so, till we hear otherwise. You must take good care of yourself. This weather is good for no creature, and must be worst of all for one in your situation. Do not venture from the fire at all, till the horrible slush of snow be off the ground.

And what becomes of our good Mother all this time? She could not be at rest of course if she were not beside you, watching over you herself. Alick struggles to report favourably of her, but we have our own apprehensions. What can I do but again and again urge her to take all possible precautions about herself

(which however she will not do!) and trust that she may escape without serious mischief. If you were once up again I will fancy you taking care of her. It must be a great comfort to have you so near her — within walking distance in the good season.

We have never had here so ugly a winter : first violent frost, snow &c., then still nastier times of the thawing sort; for a week past there has been nothing but sleet, rime and slobber, the streets half an inch deep with slush and yet a cake of slippery ice lying below that; so in spite of daily and hourly sweeping and scraping, they constantly continue. I, with some few others, go daily out, whatever wind blow. I am covered to the throat in warm wool of various textures and can get into heat in spite of fate. Jane too holds out wonderfully, ventures forth when there is a bright blink once in a week; sits quiet as a mouse when the winds are piping abroad. We understand you are far deeper in snow than we. I believe there is now a good thick quilt of it lying over the entire surface of the Island.

The Doctor was here till Tuesday morning. We saw him daily with much speech and satisfaction. A letter yesterday announced that they were fairly settled in Wight again. He looked as well as need be.

I have sent by Alick a bit half-sovereign to buy the poor new bairn a new pock. You must take it without grumbling. Tell my dear Mother that she must take care of herself, that I will write to her before many days go. Better health to us all. Our kind wishes to Robert. Good be with you every one.

Your affectionate brother,

T. CARLYLE.

Here is another and a more highly elaborated bit of London weather from an undated fragment in Mrs. Hanning's possession at the time of her death : —

“ Our weather is grown decidedly good for the last three days ; very brisk, clear and dry. Before that it was as bad as weather at any time need be : long continued plunges of wet, then clammy, glarry days on days of half wet (a kind of weather peculiar to London, and fully uglier than whole wet) : — a world of black sunless pluister, very unpleasant to move about in ! The incessant travel makes everything mud here, in spite of all that clats and besoms can do ; a kind of mud, too, which is as fine as paint, and actually almost sticks like a kind of paint! I took, at last, into the country, with old clothes and trousers folded up; there the mud was natural mud, and far less of it, indeed, little of it in comparison with other country. We dry again in a single day of brisk wind."

Early in 1841 Carlyle arranged with Fraser for the publication of Heroes and Hero-worship. "The Miscellanies, Sartor, and the other books," says Froude, "were selling well, and fresh editions were wanted."

XV. CARLYLE TO HIS MOTHER, SCOTSBRIG.

CHELSEA, Saturday [February, 1841].

MY DEAR GOOD MOTHER, — Take half a word from me to-day since I have no time for more. I had forgotten that it was Saturday till after breakfast I learnt it, and ever since there has been business on business!

We received your good little letter one evening and sent it on to John. Thanks to you for it. I had a letter too from Grahame about his Miscellanies, for which he seems amazingly thankful, poor fellow. We will not tell him about the Ecclefechan Library — let well be!

John also sends word of himself — all right enough, the "probability" that he will be here again before long.

Jane and I are well, rejoicing in the improved weather, not the best of weather yet, but immensely better than it was. Some days have been sunny and bright, a pleasant prophecy of spring.

I have bargained with Fraser for my lectures. They are now at press, that kept me so very busy. He would give me only £75, the dog, but then he undertakes a new edition of Sartor, too, (the former being sold) and gives me another £75 for that too. It is not so bad, £150 of ready money — at least money without risk. I did not calculate on getting anything at present for Teufelsdröckh. You see we are rather rising than falling, “mall in shaft,” at any rate. That is always a great point. Poor Teufelsdröckh, it seems very curious money should lie even in him. They trampled him into the gutters at his first appearance, but he rises up again, — finds money bid for him.

On the whole I expect not to be obliged to lecture this year, which will be an immense relief to me: I shall not be broken in pieces, I shall have strength for perhaps some better things than lecturing.

You spoke of going to Dumfries: I am always afraid of your getting hurt on those expeditions, but I suppose you will not be able to rest without going. I wish Jean and you both were through it.

By the bye, did I ever sufficiently tell Isabella that her butter continues excellent, none better. I owe Jamie a letter too. Alick ought to have been apprised how good his bacon was — was, for alas, I myself eat the most part of it and it is done: some weeks ago his tobacco ran out; I never told this either — I forgot everything!

Well, dear Mother, this is all I can say in my hurry. I will write again soon, but with two Books at the printer's with &c., &c., what can a poor man do? Be good bairns, one and all of you.

Your ever affectionate

T. CARLYLE.

When the proofs of Hero-Worship were finished, visits to Richard Monckton Milnes (afterward Lord Houghton), and to the James Marshalls at Headingly, gave Carlyle what seem to have been his first glimpses of life in great country houses. On the 17th of April, 1841, he communicated his impressions to his wife: "I never lived before in such an element of 'much ado about almost Nothing ;' life occupied altogether in getting itself lived ; . . . and such champagning, claretting, and witty conversationing. Ach Gott! I would sooner be a ditcher than spend all my days so. However, we got rather tolerably through it for these ten days." Visits to his mother, Miss Martineau, the Speddings, and a month in lodgings at Newby — where he probably did not think of Redgauntlet — disposed of most of the remaining holiday, and brought Carlyle back to Cheyne Row in September. The book would not yet begin itself. "Ought I to write now of Oliver Cromwell? Gott weiss ; I cannot yet see clearly." Toward the close of this year, Carlyle was asked to let himself be nominated to the new History Chair in Edinburgh University. He declined, with noble thanks.

"Our brother," whom Carlyle writes of to Mrs. Hanning, was their half-brother, already referred to, who had emigrated to Canada in 1837, and died there in 1872.

XVI. CARLYLE TO MRS. HANNING, DUMFRIES.

CHELSEA, 24 Nov'r, 1841.

DEAR JENNY, — Here is the American letter you spoke of. It arrived yesterday, and to-day, after showing it to John, I send it to you. I do not exactly know what part of Canada it is dated from, but the place lies some hundreds of miles northwest of where your husband is likely to be. Our brother seems to be going on in a very prosperous way there.

On Sunday last the Doctor showed me a letter he had written for you. It appeared to be full of rational advice, in all of which I agree. You must pluck up a spirit, my good little Jenny, and see clearly how many things you yourself, independent of all other persons, can still do. You, then, can either act like a wise, courageous person or like a fool, between which two ways of it there lies still all the difference in the world for you. . . . I assert, and believe always, that no person whatever can be ruined except by his own consent, by his own act, in this world. Your little bairn will get to walk, then you will have more time to sit to some kind of employment. This will be your first consolation.

I know not whether our Mother is still with you, but suppose yes. I wrote to her a very hurried scrawl last week. Pray take good care of her from the damp and cold. I will write to her again before long. By Alick's letter of yesterday I learn that the Doctor's Book for her is safely come to Ecclefechan. You can tell her farther that I have now settled finally about her Luther and it is hers. The cost was only some 26 shillings instead of 28.

Jane has again over-hauled the drawers which you had such work with; the best plan was found to be to clip the leg off altogether and put in four new inches above the knee! Good be with you, dear Jenny, with you, and them all.

It is evident from one letter and another that, after the removal to Dumfries and Mr. Hanning's departure for Canada, Mrs. Hanning spent more time at the Gill than in Dumfries. "Poor Helen" was Helen Mitchell from Kirkcaldy, an entertaining as well as a faithful servant. She came to Cheyne Row toward the end of 1837, was reclaimed from drink by Mrs. Carlyle, but fell hopelessly into it again after eleven years of service. "Her end was sad, and like a thing of fate."

XVII. CARLYLE TO HIS MOTHER, SCOTSBRIG.

CHELSEA, 8th January, 1842.

MY DEAR MOTHER, — You have been wandering so about of late times, and there has been such confused trouble going on, that I have not got you regularly written to. It seems to me a long while since we had any right communication together. To-day I will scribble you a word before going out. Alick says you are for moving over to Gill again to bear Jenny company till the day lengthens. If you be already gone they will send this after you.

The great trouble there has been at Scotsbrig must have been distressing to every person there, from the poor father and mother downwards. You, in particular, could not escape. The weather also is sorely inclement and not wholesome for those that cannot take violent exercise; yet Alick assures me you are “as well as usual.” Nay, he adds that you mean soon to write to me. I pray you take care, dear Mother, in your shifting to the Gill and during your stay there in the stranger house; it is bitter weather and looks as if it would continue long frosty. Tell me especially how you are, what clothes you wear, whether you get good fires. A warm bottle is indispensable in the bed at night. You have books to read, daily little bits of work to do ; you must crouch quiet till the sun comes out again.

A considerable noise has been going on about that little Review-Article of mine which I sent you. The last page of the Divine Right of Squires has been circulating widely through the Newspapers with various commentary and so forth. This I by no means grudge : as the thing is true, it may circulate as widely as it likes. It can do nothing but good (whether pleasant or painful good) being true, — let it circulate where it will. If a word of mine can help to relieve the world from an insupportable oppression, surely it shall be very welcome to do so ! The man has paid me for this “ article ” (£24) but I think I shall not soon trouble the world again with reviewing. I mean something else than that if I could get at it. On the whole, what with Edinburgh Professorships, what with Covenanter Articles, we have had rather a noisy time of it in the newspapers for a while back. It is not unpleasant, but except for aiding the sale of one’s books, perhaps it is apt to be unprofitable. Fame ? Reputation ?

&c, as old Tom White said of the whisky, “Keep your whisky to yoursel’! deevil o’ ever I’se better than when there’s no a drop on’t i’ my wame?” which is a literal truth, — both as to fame and whisky.

My new book, I may tell you now, is to be something about that same Civil War in England which Baillie was in the midst of; I think mainly or almost exclusively about Oliver Cromwell. I am struggling sore to get some hold of it, but the business will be dreadfully difficult, far worse than any French Revolution, if I am to do it right: — and if I do not do it right what is the use of doing it at all? For some time I tried actual writing at it lately, but found it was too soon yet. I must wrestle and tumble about with it, indeed at bottom I do not know yet whether ever I shall be able to make a Book out of it! All that I can do is to try, till I ascertain either Yes or No. For the rest I am grown too old and cunning now to plunge right on and attempt conquering the thing by sheer force. I lie back, canny, canny, and whenever I find my sleep beginning to suffer, I lay down the tools for a while. By Heaven’s great blessing I am not now urged on by direct need of money. We have arranged ourselves here in what to London people is an inconceivable state of thrift, and in our small way are not now tormented with any fear of want whatever, for the present. To myself my poverty is really quite a suitable, almost comfortable, arrangement. I often think what should I do if I were wealthy! I am perhaps among the freest men in the British Empire at this moment. No King or Pontiff has any power over me, gets any revenue from me, except what he may deserve at my hands. There is nothing but my Maker whom I call Master under this sky. What would I be at? George Fox was hardly freer in his suit of leather than I here: if to be sure not carrying it quite so far as the leather. Jane, too, is quite of my way of thinking in this respect. Truly we have been mercifully dealt with, and much that looked like evil has turned to be good. One thing I must tell you as a small adventure which befell, the day before yesterday. On going out for walking along one of these streets an elderly, innocent, intelligent-looking gentleman accosted me with "Apologies for introducing himself to Mr. Carlyle whose works &c, &c. He was the Parish clergyman," rector of the Parish of St. Luke's, Chelsea ! I replied of course with all civility to the worthy man (though shocked to admit that after seven years of parishionership I did not know the face of him). We walked together as far as our roads would coincide, then parted with low bows. I mean to ask about the man (whose name I do not even know yet !) and, if the accounts be good, to invite a nearer approximation.

Jack will be with us to-morrow evening, we expect ; oftenest we see him only that once in the course of a week. He is healthy, cheery and as full of talk and activity as I ever saw him. His Patient and he walk daily, or drive, or ride several hours, which is a good encourager of health. He seems likelier than ever to stay a good while in this present situation, to realize a good purse perhaps, — and then retire as a half-pay. Jane sticks close in the house ever since the frost began, for near a week now ; she is in very tolerable health. Poor Helen, our servant, heard the other night of the death of a poor sick (asthmatic) sister at Edinburgh, which grieved her to the ground for a while and still greatly afflicts her ; we are sorry for the poor creature.

Alick's long letter, you can tell him, shall be answered by and by. I had also a letter from Jean not many days ago. I have extremely little time for writing letters. You must all be patient with me. Commend me to poor Isabella, whose affliction we deeply sympathize with. Yours affectionately.

On February 26th Mrs. Welsh died at Templand, in Nithsdale, where she had lived since her daughter's marriage. Carlyle had now to pass two months and more at Templand in the settlement of affairs. By the death of her mother Mrs. Carlyle regained possession of Craigenputtock, the rent of which, £200 a year, she had settled on Mrs. Welsh for her life. "Thus, from this date onward," notes Carlyle in the Reminiscences, "we were a little richer, easier in circumstances; and the pinch of Poverty, which had been relaxing latterly, changed itself into a gentle pressure, or into a limit and little more. We did not change our habits in any point, but the grim collar round my neck was sensibly slackened. Slackened, not removed at all, — for almost twenty years yet. . . . I do not think my literary income was above £200 a year in those decades, — in spite of my continual diligence day by day."

The "cheery little cousin" was Miss Jeanie Welsh, daughter to John Welsh of Liverpool, before mentioned, and mentioned again in the last paragraph of the following letter.

XVIII. CARLYLE TO HIS MOTHER, SCOTSBRIG.

CHELSEA, Friday, 4th June, 1842.

MY DEAR MOTHER, — A letter from Jenny came in the beginning of the week; then last night another from her for Jack, which seemed to have been written at the same time, which also I opened as it passed, — forwarding them both thereupon to Jack. Jack's address is 3 Chester Terrace, Regent's Park. Tell Jenny to copy this, and then she will know it henceforth. You must also thank her very kindly for the word she sends me about you and about the rest. I find your eyes are still sore, and I doubt this hot weather will do them no good. Perhaps keeping out of the light as much as possible might be useful. I would also recommend to abstain from rubbing as much as you can. If Jack know any likely eye water, I will make him send a receipt for it. This is a very troublesome kind of thing: — but surely we ought to be thankful that it is not a worse thing too!

Jack was away in the country last week, but is come home again. He was down here on Wednesday night to tea, as fresh and hearty as ever. They are to be in London mainly, I believe, all summer. He will contrive plenty of "jaunts" &c., I suppose. It is, as formerly, an idle trade, but a very well paid one. It was precisely on that Wednesday that the Queen had been shot at. These are bad times for Kings and Queens. This young blackguard, it seems, is not mad at all; was in great want, and so forth; it is said they will hang him. Such facts indicate that even among the lowest classes of the people, Queenship and Kingship are fast growing out of date.

My poor wife is still very disconsolate, silent, pale, broken-down, and very weak. I urge her out as much as possible; her cheery little cousin, too, does what she can. Alas, it is a very sore affliction; we have but one mother to lose. I speak to her seriously sometimes, but speaking cannot heal grief; only Time and Heaven's mercy can.

As for me, I sleep tolerably well, and also have now begun to work a little, which is still better! I shall have a terrible heap of reading, of meditating, sorting, struggling of every kind. But why should I not do it, if it be a good work? I feel as if there did lie something in it. I will grudge no toil to bring it out. I go often all day to the Museum Library and search innumerable old pamphlets, &c. It is a nasty place, five miles off, and full of heat and bad air, but it contains great quantities of information. I refuse all dinners whatsoever, or very nearly all. I say, "Well, if you do take offence at me, how can I help it? In the whole world there is only one true blessing for me, — that of working an honest work. If you would give me the Bank of England, and all set to worship me with bended knees, — alas, that would do nothing for me at all. It is not you that can help me or hinder me; it is I, even I." Pray that I persist in this good course.

Poor Isabella does not seem to profit by the warm weather. I would recommend the shower bath to her. I take it daily here. Tell Jenny that there is no hurry about the shirts. She can go on with all leisure. Did Jamie ever learn from me that in the drawer of their washstand, if he will pull it out, there lies for him a little piece of new stuff for rubbing on his razor strop? I always forgot to mention it. Our weather here is excellent, threatening to be too hot by and by, which, however, I shall not grudge so much this year. Broiling weather to me will be the basis of a plenteous year for all. There is much need of it!

But I must end, dear Mother. I write hardly any letters except to you, so you will accept this as the best I can do at present. The subscription for Burns's sister is doing well, in Liverpool at least (under John Welsh). My affection to Alick and all of them. You will get this when you go to the Preaching.

My blessings on you, dear Mother, and all love.

Your son,

TOM.

XIX. CARLYLE TO HIS MOTHER, SCOTSBRIG.

CHELSEA, Monday Morning,
4th July, 1842.

MY DEAR MOTHER, — Before setting to my work, let me expend a penny and a scrap of paper on you, merely to say that we are well, and to send a bit of ugly and curious public news that you cannot yet have heard of. On Saturday night it was publicly made known that Francis, the man who last shot at the Queen, was not to be hanged, but to be sent to Botany Bay, or some such punishment. Well, yesterday about noon, as the Queen went to St. James' Chapel, a third individual presented his pistol at the Majesty of England, but was struck down and seized before he could fire it: he and another who seemed to be in concert with him are both laid up. There is no doubt of the fact. The two are both "young" men: we have yet heard nothing more of them than that. The person who struck down the pistol (and with it the man, so vehement was he) is said to be a gentleman's flunkey: but I do not know that for certain and have seen no newspaper yet. . . . Are not these strange times? The people are sick of their misgovernment, and the blackguards among them shoot at the poor Queen: as a man that wanted the steeple pulled down might at least fling a stone at the gilt weathercock. The poor little Queen has a horrid business of it. — cannot take a drive in HER clatch without risk of being shot! Our clatch is much safer. All men are becoming alarmed at the state of the country. — as I think they well may.

Jane and her cousin have this morning been got off to Windsor by the Sterlings. The jaunt in the open air will do the poor Wife good.

John is very well. I parted with him last night near his own house rather after 10 o'clock.

Adieu, dear Mother. Here is a foolish Yankee letter of adoration to me. Burn it!

Your affectionate,

T. CARLYLE.

The picture of Sartor measuring himself for shirts to be made at long range, as it were, is memorable even in the annals of Cheyne Row.

XX. CARLYLE TO MRS. HANNING, THE GILL.

CHELSEA, 21 July, 1842.

MY DEAR JENNY, — I am glad to hear of your well being, and that you have got done with the shirts, which is a sign of your industry. They will be well off your hands, and I have no doubt will be found very suitable when they arrive here. In the meanwhile I do not want them sent off yet till there are some more things to go with them. I am in no want of them yet, and shall not, I think, be so till it will be about time for the meal to be sent from Scotsbrig. At all events, you may look to that (for the present) as the way of sending them, and therefore keep them beside you till some chance of delivering them safe to my Mother or another Scotsbrig party turn up. There is no haste about them; the meal cannot be ready, I suppose, till the end of September, if then.

In the meanwhile I want you to make me some flannel things, too, — three flannel shirts especially: you can get the flannel from Alick, if he have any that he can well recommend. You can readily have them made before the other shirts go off: I have taken the measure to-day, and now send you the dimensions, together with a measuring strap which I bought some weeks ago (at one penny) for the purpose! You are to be careful to scour the flannel first, after which process the dimensions are these. Width (when the shirt is laid on its back) $22\frac{1}{2}$ inches, extent from wrist button to wrist button 61 inches,¹ length in the back 35 inches, length in the front $25\frac{1}{2}$ inches. Do you understand all that? I dare say you will make it out, and this measuring band will enable you to be exact enough. Only you must observe that at the beginning of it. . . . Hoity-Toity ! I find that it is I myself that have made a mistake there, and that you have only to measure fair with the line and all will be right ; the dimensions as above, $22\frac{1}{2}$, 61, 35, $25\frac{1}{2}$.

¹ So that each sleeve is $19\frac{1}{4}$ inches long.

If you could make me two pairs of flannel drawers, I should like very well too, but that I am afraid will be too hard for you. This is all the express work I have for you at present. Neither is there any news of much moment that I could send you. Jane continues still weak, but seems to gather strength, too. I keep very quiet and very busy, and stand the summer fully better than is usual with me here. John still continues in town, and does not speak of going yet. We meet every Sunday here at Dinner.

Our good Mother, you perhaps know, has got over to Jean for some sea bathing about Arbigland. We hope they are all well about Gill, and that a good crop is on its feet for them. Give our kind regards and continual good wishes both to Mary and Jamie, and accept them for yourself. Next time you write you had better tell me how your money stands out ; and if at any time, my dear little Sister, I can help you in anything, be sure do not neglect to write then. Our love and best wishes to you, dear Jenny.

Your affectionate brother,

T. CARLYLE.

In May, on his way back from Temp-land, Carlyle had stopped to visit Dr. Arnold at Rugby, and in August he went to Belgium with Mr. Stephen Spring Rice and his younger brother. Of this trip Carlyle wrote an extraordinarily vivid account under title of The Shortest Tour on Record. The picture of the poor lace-maker and her habitation, at Ghent, makes one think, by a queer, austere contrary, of an earlier traveler and his adventures.

In August, also, Mrs. Carlyle had gone to the Bullers', in Suffolk. Twenty capital pages of Letters and Memorials make her visit live again.

XXI. CARLYLE TO HIS MOTHER, SCOTSBRIG.

CAMBRIDGE, 7th Sep., 1842.

MY DEAR MOTHER, — I am sitting here in the "Hoop Inn" of Cambridge, in a spacious apartment, blazing with gaslight and nearly solitary. It strikes me I may as well employ the hour before bedtime in writing a word for my good Mother, — to explain to her how I am, and above all what in the world I am doing here ! There is a magnificent thunderstorm just going on, or rather beginning to pass off in copious floods of rain, and there is no other sound audible in this room ; one single fellow-traveller lies reading the Times Newspaper on the sofa opposite, and the rain quenches even the sound of his breath.

Well, dear Mother, you heard that Jane was gone into Suffolk to Mrs. Buller's, and perhaps you understand or guess that she continues still there ; nay, perhaps Jack may have informed you that on Thursday last (a week ago all but a day) I, after long higgling, set out to bring her home. Home, however, she was not to go quite so fast. Mrs. Buller, rather lively up in that region, wanted her to stay a little longer, wanted me also, I suppose, to go flaunting about, calling on Lady this and Sir Henry that, and lionizing and amusing myself as I best might in her neighbourhood. She is very kind indeed, — more hospitable and good than I have almost ever seen her to anybody. The place Troston is a quiet, sleek, green place, so intersected with green, wide lanes (loanings) all overgrown with trees that you can hardly find your way in it, — like walking in some coal-mine in paths underground; it or any green country whatever, as you know, is likely to be welcome to me. One day I walked off to a place called Thetford in Norfolk, about 8 miles from us. It was the morrow after my arrival, and I did not know the nature of the lanes then. I lost my way both going and coming, and made the distance 12 or 13 each way, but got home in time to dinner, and was all the better for my walk. Afterwards I never ventured out of sight of Troston Church-tower without first drawing for myself a little map of my route from a big map that hangs in the lobby. With my little map in my waistcoat pocket I feared nothing, and indeed in three days knew all the outs and ins of the country; — for Mrs. Buller in that interval had contrived to borrow me a farmer's horse to go about on. Was not that a friendly office to a man like me?

But to hasten to the point! Mrs. Buller's, I knew beforehand, was but some 30 miles to the east of Cromwell's country; his birth-place, the farm he had first, and the farm he had second, all lie adjoining on the Westward, either in the next County, which is this (Cambridgeshire), or in Huntingdonshire, the one Westward of this. Accordingly, having talked a long enough time about jaunts and pilgrimages, — about it and about it, — I decided at last (the women threatening to laugh at me if I did not go) on actually setting off, and accordingly here I am, with my face already homewards, the main part of my little errand successfully accomplished; and a “riding tour” through the country parts of England, which I have been talking of these dozen years or more, has actually taken effect on the small scale, — a very small scale indeed. I have ridden but two days, and on the morrow evening I shall be at Troston again, or near it. My conveyance being the farmer’s horse above mentioned, my fatigue has been great; — for it is the roughest and dourest beast nearly that I ever rode, and to-day in the morning, to mend matters, it took to the trick they call “scouring,” — in a sulLEN, windless ninny niawing. — Many a time I thought of Alick and Jamie in these Cambridge Fens, and wished one or both of them had been near me. But I let the creature take time (for it would have it), and it gradually recruited again, though not brilliant at the best; and indeed I shall be very willing to wish it good-bye to-morrow evening, were I at Troston again. Poor brute, it cannot help being supple and riding as with stilky-clogs at its feet! It has eaten four and a half feeds of corn to-day, or I think it would altogether have failed.

But at any rate I have seen the Cromwell country, got an image of it in my mind for all time henceforth. I was last night at Ely, the Bishop's City of this district. I walked in and about the Cathedral for two good hours. Thought vividly of Cromwell stepping up these floors, with his sword by his side, bidding the Priest (who would not obey his first order, but continued reading his liturgies), "Cease your fooling and come out, Sir." — One can fancy with what a gollie in the voice of him. I found the very house he had lived in. I sat and smoked a pipe about nine o'clock under the stars on the very "Horseblock" (harping-on stone) which Oliver had often mounted from, two hundred years ago. It was all full of interest, and though I could get but very little sleep at night, I did not grudge that price. To-day I rode still farther Westward to a place called St. Ives, where Oliver first took to farming.

The house they showed as his I did not believe in, but the fields that he tilled and reaped are veritably there. I sat down under the shade of one of his hedges and kindled a cigar, not without reflections! I have also seen his native town Huntingdon, with many other things to-day, and am here now on my way homeward, as I said, and will not trouble my dear good Mother with one other word of babblement on the subject at present. No country in itself can well be uglier; it is all a drained immensity of fen (or soft peat moss), and bears a considerable resemblance to the trench at Dumfries, — if that were some 30 or 40 miles square, with Parish churches innumerable, all built on dry knolls of chalky earth that rise up like islands. You can tell Jamie that it bears heavy crops! oats, beans, wheat, which they are just concluding the leading in of at present; the rest of the country being done a week or two ago.

Dear Mother, was there ever such a clatter of a letter written? And not one word of news, not one word even of the many hundred I could use in inquiring! We return to Chelsea, I expect, about Monday first. Saturday was to be proposed, but will not stand

I believe. Jack is already gone, on Saturday last, to Cheltenham, and then for North Wales. Right glad am I for him and for you that he is to come into Annandale for a little while. Poor fellow, it is long since he has been there, and he too has his own feelings and straits which he does not speak about often. My dear Mother, I will bid you all good-night. I send you my heart's best blessing o'er all the hills and rivers that lie between us to-night. The thunder is gone, and the rain. I will send you a little word when we get to Chelsea; perhaps there is something from yourself for me already forwarded to Troston. I doubt it. Good-night, my dear true Mother.

Ever your affect^e

T. CARLYLE.

I know not whether Alick has now any communication with the Whitehaven Tobacconist? A quarter of a stone might be ventured upon along with the Harvest meal, or by the Doctor or some other conveyance. It keeps in the winter; it could not be worse than my London tobacco all this year. Tell Alick about it; he rejoices always to help me whenever he can.

Carlyle's pilgrimage to Huntingdon, St. Ives, and thereabouts, is not to be confounded with his former Cromwell journey — to Naseby — undertaken a few months before, with Dr. Arnold. Froude's account of Carlyle's investigation of the battlefield was (necessarily) so incomplete that I venture to quote here two highly interesting letters from a long afterward published book, — Letters of Edward Fitzgerald. Says Fitzgerald, in a memorandum on the subject : —

“ As I happened to know the Field well, — the greater part of it then belonging to my Family, — I knew that Carlyle and Arnold had been mistaken — misled in part by an Obelisk which my Father had set up as on the highest Ground of the Field, but which they mistook for the centre-ground of the Battle. This I told Carlyle, who was very reluctant to believe that he and Arnold could have been deceived — that he could accept no hearsay Tradition or Theory against the Evidence of his own Eyes, etc. However, as I was just then going down to Naseby, I might enquire further into the matter.

“ On arriving at Naseby, I had spade and mattock taken to a hill near half a mile across from the ‘Blockhead Obelisk,’ and pitted with several hollows, overgrown with rank Vegetation, which Tradition had always pointed to as the Graves of the Slain. One of these I had opened; and there, sure enough, were the remains of skeletons closely packed together — chiefly teeth — but some remains of Shin-bone, and marks of Skull in the Clay. Some of these, together with some sketches of the Place, I sent to Carlyle.”

Fitzgerald, in a letter which has apparently not been preserved, sent the results of this first investigation to Carlyle. He wrote also from Naseby the following letter to Bernard Barton : —

[NASEBY], Sept. 22, /42.

MY DEAR BARTON, — The pictures are left all ready packed up in Portland Place, and shall come down with me, whenever that desirable event takes place. In the meanwhile here I am as before; but having received a long and interesting letter from Carlyle asking information about this Battle field, I have trotted about rather more to ascertain names of places, positions, etc. After all, he will make a mad book. I have just seen some of the bones of a dragoon and his horse who were found foundered in a morass in the field — poor dragoon, much dismembered by time: his less worthy members, having been left in the owner's summer-house for the last twenty years, have disappeared one by one, but his skull is kept safe in the hall: not a bad skull neither; and in it some teeth yet holding, and a bit of the iron heel of his boot, put into the skull by way of convenience. This is what Sir Thomas Browne calls "making a man act his Antipodes."¹ I have got a fellow to dig at one of the great general graves in the field; and he tells me to-night that he has come to bones; to-morrow I will select a neat specimen or two. In the meantime let the full harvest moon wonder at them as they lie turned up after lying hid 2400 revolutions of hers. Think of that warm 14th of June when the Battle was fought, and they fell pell-mell: and then the country people came and buried them so shallow that the stench was terrible, and the putrid matter oozed over the ground for several yards; so that the cattle were observed to eat those places very close for some years after. Every one to his taste, as one might well say to any woman who kissed the cow that pastured there.

¹ Referring to a passage in the Garden of Cyrus, near the end: "To keep our eyes open longer, were but to act our antipodes. The huntsmen are up in America, and they are already past their first sleep in Persia."

Friday, 23rd. We have dug at a place, as I said, and made such a trench as would hold a dozen fellows, whose remains positively make up the mould. The bones nearly all rotted away, except the teeth, which are quite good. At the bottom lay the form of a perfect skeleton: most of the bones gone, but the pressure distinct in the clay; the thigh and leg bones yet extant; the skull a little pushed forward, as if there were scanty room. We also tried some other reputed graves, but found nothing; indeed, it is not easy to distinguish what are graves from old marlpits, etc. I don't care for all this bone-rummaging myself; but the identification of the graves identifies also where the greatest heat of the battle was. Do you wish for a tooth?

As I began this antiquarian account in a letter to you, so I have finished it, that you may mention it to my Papa, who perhaps will be amused at it. Two farmers insisted on going out exploring with me all day: one a very solid fellow, who talks like the justices in Shakespeare, but who certainly was inspired in finding out this grave; the other a Scotchman, full of intelligence, who proposed the flesh-soil for manure for turnips. The old Vicar, whose age reaches halfway back to the day of the Battle, stood tottering over the verge of the trench. Carlyle has shewn great sagacity in guessing at the localities from the vague descriptions of contemporaries; and his short pasticcio of the battle is the best I have seen. But he will spoil all by making a demigod of Cromwell, who certainly was so far from wise that he brought about the very thing he fought to prevent, — the restoration of an unrestricted monarchy.

The substance of this letter was of course communicated by Fitzgerald to Carlyle, who promptly and gratefully replied.

CHELSEA, Saturday, 25 [24] Sept. 1842.

MY DEAR SIR, — You will do me and the Genius of History a real favour, if you persist in these examinations and excavations to the utmost length possible for you! It is long since I read a letter so interesting as yours of yesterday. Clearly enough you are upon the very battle-ground; — and I, it is also clear, have only looked up towards it from the slope of Mill Hill. Were not the weather so wet, were not, etc., etc., so many etceteras, I could almost think of running up to join you still! But that is evidently unfeasible at present.

The opening of that burial-heap blazes strangely in my thoughts: these are the very jawbones that were clenched together in deadly rage, on this very ground, 197 years ago! It brings the matter home to one, with a strange veracity, — as if for the first time one saw it to be no fable and theory, but a dire fact. I will beg for a tooth and a bullet; authenticated by your own eyes and word of honour! Our Scotch friend, too, making turnip manure of it, — he is part of the Picture. I understand almost all the Netherlands battlefields have already given up their bones to British husbandry; why not the old English next? Honour to thrift. If of 5000 wasted men you can make a few usable turnips, why, do it!

The more sketches and details you can contrive to send me, the better. I want to know, for one thing, whether there is any house on Cloisterwell; what house that was that I saw from the slope of Naseby height (Mill-hill, I suppose), and fancied to be Dust Hill Farm? It must lie about North by West from Naseby Church, perhaps near a mile off. You say, one cannot see Dust Hill at all, much less any farm house of Dust Hill, from that Naseby Height?

But why does the Obelisk stand there? It might as well stand at Charing Cross; the blockhead that it is! I again wish I had wings; alas, I wish many things; that the gods would but annihilate Time and Space, which would include all things!

In great haste, Yours most truly,

T. CARLYLE.

Both Carlyle's letter to Fitzgerald and that to his mother from Cambridge are notable illustrations of the insatiable hunger of the eye which went far to make him the great writer he was. The print of those teeth on his mind is shown in Cromwell, where we read: "A friend of mine has in his cabinet two ancient grinder-teeth, dug lately from that ground, — and waits for an opportunity to rebury them there. Sound, effectual grinders, one of them very large; which ate their breakfast on the fourteenth morning of June, two hundred years ago, and, except to be clenched once in grim battle, had never work to do more in this world!"

The old mother was not ungrateful for her son's mindfulness. Nothing in their relations is more touching than the brevity and stiffness of her letters, with every now and then some burst of natural affection which even the artificial medium cannot check. Margaret Carlyle had learned to write in adult life for the sake of replying to her son's letters, but the pen never became an obedient instrument in her hand. She could always have sympathized with Joe Gargery.

XXII. TO CARLYLE FROM HIS MOTHER.

SCOTSBRIG, Sept. 13, 1842.

MY DEAR SON,—It is a long time since you had a word from me, though I have had many kind letters from you, for which if I am not thankful enough, I am glad. I am full as well as I was when you saw me last. I am reading the poem on "Luther" and I am much pleased with it. I wish the author Godspeed. It is a good subject and well handled, is my opinion of it. I had a letter from John yesterday, he thinks he will see us in the Course of a month or so. We will be glad to see him again if it please God. We have excellent weather here. I do not remember such a summer and harvest. Jamie had a good crop and very near all in and well got up. Isabel is still poorly. She is rather better than she was at one time. How are you after your wanderings? Write as soon as you can and tell us all your news.

Ever your affectionate Mother,
M. A. C.

XXIII. TO MRS. HANNING, AT THE GILL, FROM HER MOTHER.

SCOTSBRIG, Monday [1840-1851].

MY DEAR JENNY, — I have been longing for you to come here for a long time. I want to send two hams on to London. Could you get a box which would hold the shirts and both could be sent at the same time. If you have not sent them any, bring them over as soon as you can, and come soon. At any rate bring the winter things that Jean sent. We are all in our frail way of health. Give my kindest love to young and old.

Ever your old mother,
M. A. C.

In the letter subjoined, Carlyle gives his mother the conclusion of his visit to the Bullers, of which he had written so fully.

“The good Mrs. Strachey,” sister to Mrs. Buller, was the pious widow of a rich examiner in the India House. Mr. Strachey, eighteen years before, had accompanied Carlyle to Paris. “Min” must have been a household name for Miss Jeannie Welsh.

XXIV. CARLYLE TO HIS MOTHER, SCOTSBRIG.

CHELSEA, 19th Sept. 1842.

MY DEAR MOTHER, — Will you take the smallest of notes from me merely to perform the essential function of a note, — ask you how you are and say that I am well.

I wrote you ten days ago a long letter dated Cambridge from my Inn in that Town. This I hope you received duly. It would let you into my ways in those weeks. Next day I got well enough back to Troston, rain attending me for the last two hours. I was terribly wearied of my great flat-soled monster of a horse, but much gratified with my pilgrimage and all rejoiced very handsomely at my return. Charles had come in the interim. They would not let us away on Monday as we proposed. It was settled at last that Thursday should be the day. Charles came up with us to Town. We had a very pleasant kind of journey and got safe home to dinner here. So ends the Troston journey and I think all travelling for this season. The good Mrs. Strachey, who is now in Italy, wrote to offer us her house and servants for two months at Clifton, a beautiful Village near Bristol, 100 miles to the west of us, but we have refused. Rolling stone gathers little bog. I must resolutely get some work done now.

Jane seems really better for her country excursion. I observed to-day that she eats a whole slice of bread to breakfast again. Little Min W. is still here. I think she likes much better to be here than at home, in the midst of luxury but also of Liverpool stupidity. She is a fine cheery little lass, very pretty too, and would make a good wife for somebody.

The Duke of Buccleuch has now actually paid me the £100 — at least sent a draft payable in 10 days hence. I sent my thanks and the business is all over — a right agreeable result. You may tell Jamie that the Templand Grates too are paid, payable at the same time; that we saved the Grates that day, and our broiling journey was not in vain, therefore.

I hope they have now all got a sight of your picture and that I shall get it soon. It will be needless to wait for Jack, he, as I reflect, can do nothing towards carrying it. Poor fellow — you will see him again. Here is his last letter, though it can have no news for you. How goes Jamie's harvest? The weather has been brittle ever since that thunderstorm. How go you yourself, my dear good Mother? Somebody ought to write to me now. I do not hear anything even from Jean. Could Jenny make me two pairs of flannel drawers along with the shirts? I fear not. Adieu, dear Mother, my love to one and all.

T. CARLYLE.

XXV. CARLYLE TO MRS. HANNING, THE GILL.

CHELSEA, 2d Nov. 1842.

MY DEAR JENNY, — Yesterday I meant to have written to you, in order to be ready for Thursday at Annan, such had been my firm purpose, but something came in the way, and I altogether forgot till this morning. Lest I make a similar mistake for Saturday too, I will take time by the forelock and write even now. The barrel of meal, and the box of garments arrived all safe, on Saturday night last.

And I have to apprise you, as the expert needlewoman of the whole, that all fits with perfect correctness. I have had a pair of drawers on, and a flannel shirt, I have one of the cambric shirts on me at present: everything is as right as if it had been made under my own eye. The flannel of the shirts is excellent, they are made to the very measure. The drawers also are the best fit of the article I have had for several years back; two of the pairs, I observe, are of the fine flannel the shirts are of. Perhaps it will prove too cool for the depth of winter — perhaps not, but either way I have plenty of warmer, for that season. One of the pairs is of right shaggy flannel. My good Mother sent a fine wool plaid too and a dozen pair of socks, few mortals are better off for woolen this winter! — As to the muslin shirts Jane says they are excellently sewed, — She is the judge, I find them to lie flat on the breast too, which the old would never do.

In short, it is all perfectly right; and you will be very glad, I doubt not, that you have got it well off your hands. If in the course of the winter, you fall out of work, and want a canny job for yourself, it will be acceptable enough to me that you set Jean upon getting you some more stuff, and make me half a dozen more of the like shirts! But this you need not, unless in the aforesaid case. I believe the stock I have will serve me some couple of years or more. But they eat no bread. — If you ever do think of this, you can let me know before starting; I may perhaps have some remarks to make.

You will be nestling all under cover now at Gill, when the short days and the frosts are come. I hope you have a right stock of fuel in your end of the house; and that your little carpet is now complete. I long to question the Dr. about you when he comes back hither. He is at a place they call Malvern some 120 miles west of this.

How are Mary and Jamie? very busy, and well, I hope. Mary never writes. I sent James a tobacco-box! — Poor Allan Cunningham the Poet is dead very suddenly; a sad event for several of us! —

Adieu, Dear little sister.

Ever your affect.

T. CARLYLE.

Much as Carlyle had been thinking about Cromwell, another book was to come first, — a book for which his very trip to Cromwell's

[To Mrs. Hanning]

Chelsea, 4 May, 1843 -

Dear Jenny,

I had your letter the other day, and was glad to hear you had got back to Gillingham, where as we understand has need of you at present. These are terribly hard times for farmers; but they must not be discouraged: it is not likely the times will continue so bad; and if they do, some new arrangement will have to be fallen upon, - not by them alone but by the whole farming world. Tell Mary to take care and not overwork herself in her present state. Do you do her whatsover you can in the way of help and support; I know you will without my telling you. - I like well to hear of your teaching the two little Boscians to read; that is a right good work, in which there will be a bless-ing if in any work whatever. —

But the grand object of this fraction of a Note was to let you know that you are likely to see the Doctor again very soon. He is off this morning to his school; and may perhaps be out in Annandale on Monday or Tuesday if there be Steam on either of those days. He will of course look in upon the Cell not long after that & he it is who will tell you all our news much better than I can write them. He talks of staying "for a week or two", that is to say, as long as he finds it pleasant and useful for him and for all of you: he is in very good health and spirits; but full of uncertainty as to fixing himself, — which I wish much, but heartily hope, he could never do.

We had a Box from Scotland last night; all safe, and the contents excellent. I add no other word today; but a hearty salutation to one and all at Cell, Jennie, Mary, Jenny, and all the Bairns down to the youngest. Yours affly Brother J. Carlyle country was fruitful in suggestion. At St. Ives he had seen not only Cromwell's farm, but also St. Ives poorhouse with its inhabitants, — "in the sun," to be sure, but neither spinsters nor knitters, nor workers after any fashion, for the simple reason that they had no work to do. The Chartist riots of 1842 remained in Carlyle's mind with this symbolic picture, and by October of the same year he was deeply pondering the condition of "the English nation all sitting enchanted, the poor enchanted so that they cannot work, the rich enchanted so that they cannot enjoy." Over against this contemporary view Carlyle set the life of the monks of Bury St. Edmunds, as told by their chronicler, Jocelyn de Brake-londe; and the result was Past and Present, written, apparently with less struggle than any of the author's other books, in the first seven weeks of 1843. Although Carlyle went too far in this work, — as indeed he so seldom failed to do, — Past and Present proved the germ of more than one sadly needed reform; and the splendid, sonorous passage beginning, "All true work is sacred," will remain, one must believe, an inalienable possession of English literature and English morals.

Publication followed in April, and soon afterward Carlyle wrote in his Journal: "That book always stood between me and Cromwell, and now that has fledged itself and flown off." Face to face with Oliver again, Carlyle went in the summer of 1843 to see famous battlefields of the civil war. He so planned his itinerary as to reach Dunbar on the 3d of September, — the day of the fight there, the day of Worcester fight, and the day of Cromwell's death.

This professional journey was preceded by a peaceful month at Scotsbrig, and followed by a visit to Erskine which fixes the date of the next letter.

XXVI. CARLYLE TO HIS MOTHER, SCOTSBRIG.

[LINLATHEN, early September, 1843.]

YESTERDAY by appointment, the good Thomas Erskine took me up at Kirkcaldy, carried me off hither on the top of the coach, bag and baggage. The day was damp and dim, not exactly wet, yet in danger of becoming very. There had been rain in the night time (Sabbath night or early on Monday morning) but there fell no more. This day again is oppressively hot, dry yet without sun or wind — a baddish "day for a stock." But they prophesy fair weather now — which I shall be glad of, and the whole country will be glad, for all is white here, in sheaves and stooks, and little got into ricks. We got here about 5 in the evening, a great party of people in the house (a big Laird's house with flunkeys &c., &c.). I was heartily tired before I got to bed. I do not think I shall be rightly at rest till I get on ship board, then I will lie down and let all men have a care of stirring me, — they had better let the sleeping dog lie! The Dundee steamers are allowed to be the best on these waters, large swift ships and very few passengers in them at present. I spoke for my place yesterday and am to have the best. The kind people here will relieve me down (it is four miles off) and then about 4 o'clock in the afternoon — I shall — light a pipe in peace and think of you all, speaking not a word. I expect to sleep well there too, and then on Friday, perhaps about 3 o'clock, I may be at London Bridge and home by the most convenient conveyance to Chelsea for dinner. This, if all go well, this ends for the present my pilgrimings up and down the world.

Dear Mother, I wish I had gone direct home when I left you, for it is not pleasant somehow to be still in Scotland and far from you. I speak not the thoughts I send towards you, for speech will not express them. If I arrive home on Friday you may perhaps find a newspaper at Ecclefechan on Sabbath morning, Monday much likelier. God bless you all.

T. CARLYLE.

The passage about Jeffrey in the next letter is better than the corresponding one given by Froude. The reader who remembers Jeffrey's complaint that Carlyle was "so dreadfully in earnest," will smile at Carlyle's counter charge that Jeffrey had "too little real seriousness in him" to "make a nice old man."

XXVII. CARLYLE TO HIS MOTHER, SCOTSBRIG.

LINLATHEN, DUNDEE,
Tuesday, 12th Sep. 1843.

MY DEAR MOTHER, — According to promise, I write you another little word to announce that I am safe so far on my way, that I embark to-morrow and hope to be home on Friday afternoon. I am heartily desirous of it! This last part of my travels has been considerably the weariest, for I have been all along eager chiefly to have done with it. Jamie knows how fain I would never have entered upon it all. He took notice of my reluctance at Dumfries and how welcome a shower of rain would have been to me! However it is near ending now; and I shall enjoy the quiet of home all the more. One thing, dear Mother, let me straightway tell you; that I have not left one of my new shirts, that the whole six, when I fold them duly out, are here. I grieve that you should have had a moment's uneasiness about that matter, which is due only to my own blindness and numbness; my hope is that you did not take it up too earnestly, but left the matter over "till Jenny came."

I have now got two letters from Jane, the last of them only yesterday! All is well at Chelsea; Jack not yet settled in any lodging, nor in the least decided what to do, but "in a state of torpor" as Jane says "playing with the cat." He was dining with Lady Clare; that was the last feat recorded of him. I was much grieved to hear that you had somehow missed Alick's letter: has it never yet turned up for you? I am too ignorant about the business to form any conjecture how it could have come about. Meanwhile it was very lucky that there came another letter of the same date for Jack:— this I am in hopes will be ready for me at London when I arrive. By the bye, might it not be that Alick had only meant and fully intended to write you a letter, and then had suddenly found that he would not have time by that mail? Of course the two letters, if there had been two, would come together: it is unaccountable how one of them should drop by the way. What a blessing to us to hear that poor Alick is safe there and ready to begin his adventure on fair terms. Jane says his letter is of very composed tone and “very practical looking.” She seems to like the tone of it well. I went over to Edinburgh since I last wrote. I there saw Gordon, saw various other friends— with more or less of labour and fatigue. I spent a forenoon with Jeffrey who is very thin and fretful I think; being at any rate weakly, he is much annoyed at present by a hurt on his shin— a quite insignificant thing otherwise, which however disables him from walking. Poor Jeffrey! he does not make a nice old man, he has too little real seriousness in him for that. On the whole I was heartily glad to quit Edinburgh again and get away from it into quietude across the Frith. I wrote to Jean at Dumfries one day.

“Carlyle returned from his travels very bilious,” so his wife wrote to Mrs. Aitken in October, 1843, “and continues very bilious up to this hour.” He could not refuse a “certain admiration” at the state of the house, which had been painted and papered in his absence. Mrs. Carlyle, with her own hands, had put down carpets, newly covered chairs and sofas, and arranged a library according to his (expressed) mind. His satisfaction lasted only three days, for on the morning of the fourth day “the young lady next door took a fit of practising on her accursed piano-forte.” There had then to be another upheaval: “down went a partition in one room, up went a new chimney in another;” and still another library, farther from the piano, was thus contrived. Finally, the young lady, charmed by “a seductive letter” from Carlyle, agreed never to play until two in the afternoon. The dinner hour was changed to the middle of the day, because Carlyle thought it would be better for his digestion.

Although these changes, which in Mrs.

Carlyle's account seem planet-shaking, were in the interest of Cromwell, Cromwell remained persistently unwritable. On the 4th of December the historian wrote to Sterling: "Confound it! I have lost four years of good labour in the business; and still the more I expend on it, it is like throwing good labour after bad." Two days later he put a better face on it to his mother.

XXVIII. CARLYLE TO HIS MOTHER, SCOTSBRIG.

CHELSEA, Monday, 6th Dec. 1843.

MY DEAR MOTHER, — We have a letter from Jean this week, who reports a visit to you and gives us a description of what you were about. We were very glad to look in upon you in that way. Jean describes you as very well when they came, but since then (though she tells us of your prohibition to mention it at all) there has been some ill turn of health which we long greatly to hear of the removal of! I study, dear Mother, not to afflict myself with useless anxieties, but on the whole it is much better that one knows exactly how matters do stand, the very fact, no better and no worse than it is. To-day there was a little Note from James Aitken apprising us that the Books are come, that Jenny is with him. He has evidently heard nothing farther from Scotsbrig, so we will hope things may have got into their usual course again there. But Jamie or somebody may write us a scrap of intelligence, surely? . . .

This is said to be a very unhealthy season here; for the past two months about two hundred more deaths in the week have occurred than is usual at this season, but I rather conjecture it is the result of the long continued hardship the Poor have been suffering, which now, after wearing out the constitution by hunger and distress of mind, begins to tell more visibly! Our weather is very mild, soft without any great quantity of rain and not at all disagreeable. Jane's cold is gone again and we are in our common way.

My Book goes on badly, yet I do think it goes on, in fact it must go: Bore away at it with continuous boring day and night and it will be obliged to go! I study however not to "split my gall" with it, but to "hasten slowly" as the old Romans said. When writing will not brother with me at all, I fling it entirely by and go and walk many a mile in the country. I have big thick shoes, my jacket is waterproof against slight rain, I take a stick in my hand and walk with long strides. The farther I walk, the abler I grow; in fact I am rather in better health, I think, than usual, if all things are considered. Jack and I had a long walk after Tailors for some three hours in the moonlight streets last night. To-day it is damp, but I am for a sally again. Alas, it is but a very poor morning task I have done, but we cannot help it. Adieu, dear good Mother, for our sakes take care of yourself. My love to all.

Yours affectionly

T. CARLYLE.

Carlyle never liked any portrait of himself. The one mentioned in the following letter had made him look like "a flayed horse's head."

XXIX. CARLYLE TO HIS MOTHER, SCOTSBRIG.

CHELSEA, 10th March, 1844.

MY DEAR MOTHER, — It is a shame for me if I do not write a bit of a letter to you. There is nothing else I can do for you at present. I will scribble you a few words of news on this paper, let other employments fare as they can for the present.

I sent your good little note to the Doctor. Jamie's letter for Alick came duly to hand and was duly forwarded; I also wrote a letter to Alick myself. Poor fellow, I suppose he has had a very solitary, meditative winter of it over in America, and has no doubt had a great many reflections in his head, looking back and looking forward, with perhaps sadness enough, but it will do him good, I really believe. Perhaps this winter, seemingly one of the idlest he has had, may turn out to be one of the most profitably occupied. My own hope and persuasion is that he will now do well, that he is probably about to begin a new course of activity on better terms than before, better terms both inward and outward, and that in fine, poor fellow, he may begin to see the fruit of his labor round him and go on with much more peace and prosperity than heretofore. . . . I also like the tone of his letters, which is much quieter than it used to be. He does not know, I suppose, in what direction he is to go when April arrives. I urged, as Jamie did, that a healthy quality of situation should outweigh all other considerations whatever, that for the rest all places seemed to me much alike ; if the land were cheap, it would be unfavourably situated &c. I also hinted my notion that a small piece of good handy soil might be preferable to a large lot of untowardly, outlying ground. We can only hope and pray he may be guided well. We cannot assist him with any real guidance. Difficulties beset a man everywhere under this sun. There if he have patience, insight, energy and justness of mind he will daily conquer farther, — not otherwise, either in America or here. But, as I said, I have never lost hope with Alick, and I have now better hope than ever. We will commit him to the all-wise Governor with many a prayer from the bottom of all our hearts that it may be well with him. To hear and know that he does see good under the sun, fighting his way like a true man in that new country ! — what a comfort to you and to every one of us. My dear Mother, I know your heart is many a time sad about Alick. He is far away and there are others of us gone still farther, beyond the shores of this earth, whither our poor thoughts vainly strive to follow them, — our hearts' love following them still : — but we know this one thing, that God is there also, in America, in the dark Grave itself and the unseen Eternity — even He is there too, and will not He do all things well? We have no other Anchor of the soul in any of the tempests, great or little, of this world. By this let us hold fast and piously hope in all scenes and seasons whatsoever. Amen.

You bid me “call on Patience” in this Book of mine. Dear Mother, it is the best and only good advice that can be given. I do endeavour to call on patience and sometimes she comes, and if I keep my shoulder stiffly at the wheel withal, we shall certainly get under way by and bye. The thing goes indeed, or now promises to go, a little better with me. I stand to it as I can. But it will be a terribly difficult job and take a long time, I think. However, that it is a useful one, worthy to be done by me I am resolved, and so I will do it if permitted — the return and earthy reward of it may be either great or small, or even nothing and abuse into the bargain, just as it likes. Thank Heaven I can do either or any way as to that, for this time, and indeed, often when I look at it, the prizes people get in this world and the kind of people that get them seem but a ridiculous business. If there were not something more serious behind all that, I think it would hardly be worth while to live in such a place as this world at all. In short I hold on the best I can — and my good Mother's picture looking down on me here, seems to bid me "call on Patience" and persevere like a man.

Jane has not been very well in these cold stormy weeks, but I think is now getting better again. It is the spring weather, which this year has been the real winter; all manner of people are unwell here at present. You in the North have it still worse, far worse than we. Many a time have I asked myself what is becoming of my good old Mother in these wild blasts. Surely you keep good fires at Scotsbrig? Surely you wear the new Hawick sloughs? Jane finds hers very warm and nice; but the thing you might improve greatly and never do is your diet. I think you should live chiefly on fowl. A hen is always fair food, divide her into four pieces — she makes you an excellent dinner of soup and meat for four days. This you know very well for others, but never learn it for yourself. I am very serious. You should actually set about this reform. Do now — you will find it more important on your health than any medicine or other appliance you can think of. Jenny, I suppose, is still at the Gil. When you feel tired of solitude again she will come back to you. The bairns as they grow will be quieter and give less trouble. Poor Jenny, no doubt of it, she has many cares of her own: we should all be gentle with her, pity her and help her what we can.

But now I suppose you are very impatient to know what is in that paste board roll tied with string. Open the string with your scissors and you will see — one of the ugliest pictures ever drawn of man. A certain person here has been publishing some book called “Spirit of the Age,” pretending to give people account of all the remarkable men of the age; he has put me into it — better luck to him. He wrote several months ago requesting that I should furnish him with some life of myself — forsooth! This I altogether begged leave respectfully to decline, but he got hold of a picture that a certain painter has of me, and of this he has made an engraving, — like me in nothing, or in very little, I should flatter myself. Let Isabella roll the paper of it the contrary way and then it will lie flat, if indeed the post office bags do not squeeze it all to pieces, which I think is fully as likely and will be no great matter. I sent it to you as to the one that had a right to it. Much good may it do you!

Jamie said he would write. Let him do so — or else you yourself ought to write, or both will be best. Jack and I were at Dinner together among a set of notables the night before last, came home together smoking two cigars, all right. Adieu, dear Mother, my big sheet is done. My regards to Isabella, to Jamie and them all. My blessings with you, dear Mother.

Yours affect.

T. CARLYLE.

Carlyle maps the Gill, as well as other places to which these letters make frequent reference, in his introductory note to Letter 283, in the "Letters and Memorials of Jane Welsh Carlyle:" — "The Gill, Sister Mary's poor but ever kind and generous human habitation, is a small farmhouse, seven miles beyond Annan, twenty-seven beyond Carlisle, eight or ten miles short of Dumfries. . . . Scotsbrig lies some ten miles northward of the Gill (road at right angles to the Carlisle and Dumfries Railway)."

“Our brother,” spoken of in the second paragraph, is again the half-brother already mentioned.

XXX. CARLYLE TO MRS. JAMES AUSTIN, THE GILL.

CHELSEA, 30th April, 1844.

MY DEAR MARY, — We seldom hear directly of you and it is a long while since you have had an express word from any of our hands here. You are not to suppose that we forget you on that account. Far enough from that! You are many times in my thoughts. I fancy you and James struggling along in your diligent, industrious way, struggling to fight your battles in these bad times, and from the bottom of my heart I affectionately bid you God Speed. Struggle away, my dear sister. We must so struggle and we must not be beaten. Assure yourself always that I am not less brother-like in heart towards you than in old days when you saw me oftener and heard from me oftener. To-day I send you a little slip of paper which will turn into a sovereign when you present it at the Annan Post Office and sign your name “Mary Austin” — from me “at Chelsea.” If you be not there yourself, James can sign for you if you sign it first, but the thing is in no haste and will lie till you go. Buy yourself a bit of a bonnet or anything you like with the piece of money and wear it with my blessing, sometimes thinking of us here.

No doubt you hear duly about us. You have heard I suppose how Alick is gone over to Canada, to our brother there, not into the deep Western regions of America with Clow, which Canada arrangement of Alick's we like better than the other. It seems to me Alick may do well there now. He will get a piece of land and every year that he tills it faithfully it will be growing better for him. Labour is labour, not joyful but heavy and sore in any part of this world, but if a person see any fruit of his labour it is always an encouragement to him.

Our dear old Mother seems to have been rather weaklier this last winter than heretofore. Jack had a letter yesterday from Jennie at Scotsbrig which represents her as being pretty well at present. I think Jenny should stay much with her and look after her. Good old Mother — the spring weather will grow gradually into steady summer and then she will have a better time of it, we may hope.

Jack was here last night. He talks of going North to "the country," probably toward Annandale, before long, but his movements are very uncertain. He has not yet any fixed employment here and would be much better if he had. He does not seem to like medicine and is hovering among a great variety of things. We always hope he will fix himself on some specific object by and bye. As for me I am very busy but making very bad progress. I have nothing for it but to bore along mole-like ; I shall get out some time or other. Our spring wind has turned round tempestuously into the North of late and brought cold and dust, with the glare of sunshine, not so pleasant to the invalid part of us. Jane, however, is tolerably well and growing stronger as the sun grows. She sends her old love to you and kind remembrances. Give my regards to James — he must be planting his potatoes now. Love to you.

John Sterling, whose illness is lamented in the next letter, died on the 18th of the following September. Shortly before his death he wrote to Carlyle: “Towards me, it is still more true than towards England, that no man has been and done like you.”

XXXI. CARLYLE TO DR. JOHN CARLYLE, SCOTSBRIG.

CHELSEA, 5th Aug. 1844.

MY DEAR BROTHER, — Your letter in my dearth of news was very welcome to me. You should keep me going at least for Scotsbrig news while you are there. Our good Mother must go back to the bathing. I hope the next spring, rides will prove handier. Our weather here too is much broken with rain, though otherwise warm and genial.

I asked about your Book-sheets of Cochrane. The sheets were duly furnished: the book is lying bound and ready in the London Library. I would have brought it home with me had there been a conveyance at my command. I left it lying there for yourself. Our City is got almost empty and very quiet in comparison. I hope I shall get on with somewhat less interruption in my labour; it is a sluggish element, sluggish as thick mud and bottomless, except when one makes a bottom. Nothing but strenuous hard work, harder than I have yet continuously given it, will ever bring me through; for all is chaos within it and without it. Eheu!

A striving Scotch youth came to me the other week, equal, as he said, to all kinds of old manuscripts &c, &c. I gave him a sovereign to copy me that Election Tumult? of d'Ewer at Ipswich. I have got that here and think of trying to make a magazine article of it somewhere. The poor lad attempted farther to make an estimate of copying all d'Ewer's Parl't manuscript for me. £30, he said, would do it and I had for some days real thoughts of the thing, but alas, my man in the interim was discovered by me to be a quite loose-talking, dishonest-minded little thing, unable to employ on any business; so having found him a job with Maurice, writing to dictation (in which dishonesty cannot long remain undetected) I shook him off, but it does partly appear to me I must have that MSS. to read and con over at my leisure — if possible. I am now about consulting with the Secretary of the Camden Society, but expect to hear that they, poor dilettante quacks, will do nothing. Nothing however will serve me as an answer from them. I think if I had the MS. right here I could either now or some time pay myself £30 of it. On the whole I am looking out for a hand amanuensis to copy me a good many things. I find such a one may be got, if you alight luckily, for some £60 or £80 to work all the year round; it is but the price of keeping a horse here. On the other hand no Bookseller can be made in the least to bite at such a thing; — the inane mountebank quacks, — one must do it one's self or it will remain undone. I made them get into the Library a Thrigg and now also a Vicen, Part First, which are real conquests to me.

Nothing remarkable has arrived here except Emerson's letter, which indeed is not very remarkable either. Poor Sterling, as you will see by it, and may know more directly now from me, continues very ill, even I begin now to doubt, to despond altogether. He is obliged to "sit up all night propped with pillows," the greater part of his lungs (Clark says) is quite useless to him and he cannot get breath enough without immense difficulty. Anthony is going down to wait near him awhile. Poor Sterling! I fear the worst. Robertson, they say, is in Sutherland, marking out the site of Free Kirks. Go ahead!

Jamie's letter was very gratifying and satisfactory; certainly we will take a couple more of Annandale hams. I will write to him more specially on the subject very soon.

Isabella too is in the way of shower baths and better: Bravely that is good. Did any of you write to Alick by this mail? Jane is well again from her bit of headaches. Blessings on my Mother and you all.

T.

In 1844 there was "no Scotland" for Carlyle, but early in September he went to Mr. and Lady Harriet Baring at the Grange. The Baring friendship had begun to rise into his life, — not yet in the form of a cloud.

All the rest of the year Carlyle stayed closely at home, working on Cromwell, and seeing fewer people than usual. The following quaint fragment belongs to this period, from which Froude has preserved none of Carlyle's letters or journal record.

XXXII. CARLYLE TO MRS. HANNING.

CHELSEA, 16th Dec. 1844.

DEAR JENNY, — I dare say you can knit Wristikins. It has struck me in these cold days I might as well apply to you to have a pair. The best pair I yet have is a very old pair now, which either you, or I think Jean, knit for me at Hoddam Hill when you were little bairns many years ago. They have beautiful stripes of red yet, as fresh as ever. In fact I sometimes wear them in preference to the pair Jane has bought for me out of the shops here. Being already provided as you see I will not in the least hurry you as to the matter — wait till you have leisure, till you can get right your colors &c. &c. — only I will tell you what kind of thing will suit me and how you can do it when convenient. The great defect of all my present wristikins is that they are too slight, too thin, and do not fill up the cuff of the coat, which is rather wide with me. They should be at least double the common thickness of those in the shops. If you had fine, boozy yarn and took it two ply it will make a pretty article. Then as to color, it should be deep for our reeky atmosphere here; red is beautiful, a stripe of good red, and holds out well, but perhaps the basis had better be some sort of brown. Please your own eye. There never was a good horse had an ill color. As to breadth I think they should be at least three inches. . . .

The horse which Carlyle describes to his mother as “ a very darling article ” was a new one, called “ Black Duncan.”

Of Addiscombe Froude writes : “ The Barings had a villa at Addiscombe, and during the London season frequently escaped into the Surrey sunshine.”

XXXIII. CARLYLE TO HIS MOTHER, SCOTSBRIG.

CHELSEA, 12th July, 1845.

MY DEAR MOTHER, — My hurry is indeed great, but it ought to be greater than it is before I neglect writing you a little word this week as I did last. I am whipt about from post to pillar at a strange rate in these weeks.

Jack's visit to you was a welcome piece of news here. The good account he gave of you was much wanted. We are very sorry indeed to hear of poor Isabella. It seems as if nothing could be done for her, and her own weakness and suffering must be very great. Jamie is kind and patient, you may assure him of our sympathies. A sudden turn for the better may take place, I understand, as of its own accord all at once. Let us keep hoping the best.

The back of this sorrowful Book is now broken. I think another month of stiff labour will see it well through. They are printing away at the second volume — about half done. I have to go along amid endless confusions, the way one has to do in all work whatsoever. The Book will, on the whole, be better than I hoped, and I have had some honest thoughts in the writing of it which make me the more careless what kind of reception the world gives it. The world had better try to understand it, I think, and to like it as well as it can! Here is another leaf of a proof sheet to be a token to you of our progress. So soon as ever it is over I am off for Annandale. The heat has never been very oppressive to me, never violent beyond a day or two at a time, then rain comes and cools it again. I get considerable benefit of my horse, which is a very darling article, black, high, very good natured, very swift — and takes me out into the green country for a taste of that almost every day. I sometimes think of riding it up into Annandale, but that will be too lengthy an operation.

Jane is going to Liverpool to her Uncle's in a fortnight. She will stay with them a week, then another week with some country friends in that quarter. I wished her to go to Scotland and see old friends there at Haddington and elsewhere, but she is rather reluctant to that. She is not very strong and has many sorrows of her own, poor little thing, being very solitary in the world now. In summer however she is always better.

I have heard nothing from Jack of late days. I suppose him to be still at Mr. Raine's. Perhaps uncertain whitherward he will go next. At any rate country is better than town at present, — free quarter than board-wages. I expect he will come back to you again before the season end.

We were out at a place called Addiscombe last week among great people, very kind to us, but poor Jane could sleep only about an hour each night — three hours in all. I stayed but one night, came home on my black horse again. Some peace and rest among green things would be very welcome to me — and it is coming soon, I hope. Adieu, dear Mother — my kind love to you and to all of them. I am in great haste and can speak but a few words to mean much by them. My blessings with you.

On the 26th August, 1845, Carlyle wrote: "I have this moment ended Oliver; hang it! He is ended, thrums and all." And presently the author joined his wife at Seaforth near Liverpool. After a few days there with the Paulets, he went on by water to Annan and his mother. From Seaforth again, he writes to her on the journey Chelsea-ward.

XXXIV. CARLYLE TO HIS MOTHER, SCOTSBRIG.

SEAFORTH, LIVERPOOL,

Friday, 17 Oct'r, 1845.

MY DEAR MOTHER, — I hope you have, this morning, got the little Note I pushed into the Post Office for you at Lancaster, and consoled yourself with the assurance that all the difficult part of my journey was well over. I am quite safe, and in good quarters here, since yesterday afternoon; and will now write you another word with a little more deliberation than yesterday. My journey hither was altogether really pleasant: a fine bright day, and a swift smooth carriage to sit in, nothing wanted that one could wish on such an occasion. I got along to this house about half past four, when dinner was ready and a welcome as if it had been home, — real joy to me. It has all gone much better than I could have expected since I quitted Kirtlebrig and Jamie, that night.

I find the good people here did send their carriage for the Steamer; and a very wild adventure that was, and much better that I had but little to do with it, and could plead that I had forbidden them to do such a thing! The Paulet carriage went duly to the Clarence Dock, after inquiring at the Steamer Office too, and waited for the Royal Victoria from half past 8 on Wednesday night till past 12, when the Docks close; but no Royal Victoria came! She did not make her appearance till noon yesterday, owing to fog or wind, or what cause I have not yet heard, — not till twelve o'clock yesterday; when the Paulet carriage was again in attendance: but of course there was no guest there; the guest was advancing by another much less uncomfortable route! On the whole it was a good luck I did not get into that greasy Whale's Belly (as I call it); twenty-four hours there would have reduced me to a precious pickle!

Our journey to Lancaster as I told you was decidedly prosperous, almost pleasant thro' the moonlight country, with plenty tobacco to smoke! The wild solitude of Shap Fell at midnight is a thing I really like to have seen. And then the railway yesterday was all the welcomer, and the daylight. At Carlisle I got myself a pound of tobacco from Irving, so do not fret your heart, dear Mother, about that! I also took out my old dressing-gown there and wrapt it well round my legs, which was useful. A small proportion of corn, you may tell Jamie, was still in the fields here and there all the way; but to-day and last night there is a rustling thuddening North wind which must have dried it.

Dr. Carlyle's Dante, which he was very "eager upon," was the prose translation of the Inferno, so well done that many readers have regretted that the translator did not proceed.

XXXV. CARLYLE TO HIS MOTHER, SCOTSBRIG.

CHELSEA, 31 Oct'r, 1845.

MY DEAR MOTHER, — You will take a short word from me rather than none at all, to tell you that we are all struggling along here without disaster; which indeed is all that is to be told. I write also to see if I can induce you to make use of one of those Letter-covers which I left, and to send me a small line about yourself and how you are. Except one short line from Jamie to the Doctor, I have heard nothing at all since I left you.

There has been no rain, or almost none whatever since I left Scotsbrig; so that, I hope, tho' your weather can hardly have been so favourable, Jamie is now over with his harvest, and fast getting all secured under thatch-and-rope. The Potatoe business, as I learn from the Newspapers, proves very serious everywhere, in Ireland as much as anywhere; and over all Europe there is a rather deficient crop; besides which, the present distracted railway speculation and general fever of trade is nearly certain to break down soon into deep confusion, so that one may fear a bad winter for the poor, a sad thing to look forward to. They are best off, I think, who have least to do with that brutal Chase for money which afflicts me wherever I go in this country. "Give me neither poverty nor riches, feed me with food convenient for me."

Our freedom from rain has not hindered the November fogs from coming in somewhat before their time. The weather is not wholesome, many people have got cold in these late days. I advise you, dear Mother, to put on your winter clothing and be cautious of going out except when the sun is shining. In the morning and evening do not venture at all. This is the most critical time of all, I believe, these weeks while the change to winter is just in progress. I thought myself extremely well here for a week after my return, and indeed was so and hope again to be so — much improved by my journey, — but last Sabbath, paying no heed to these frost fogs, I caught a little tickling in my nose which rapidly grew into a sniffling, and by the time next day came I had a regular ugly face-ache and fair foundation for cold in all its forms, which required to be energetically dealt with and resisted on the threshold. Next day, accordingly, I kept the house strictly and appealed to medicine and their diet, and so on Wednesday morning I had got the victory again and have been getting round and growing nearer the old point ever since — in fact reckon myself quite well again, except that I take a little care of going out at night &c. Jane has had a little whiff of cold too, but it is abating again. We are taught by these visitations to be upon our guard. The Doctor is quite well, tho' I think he sits too much in the house, being very eager upon his Dante at present.

They are not to publish the Cromwell till “the middle of next month” — about a fortnight.

“They are not to publish the Cromwell till ‘the middle of next month,’” wrote Carlyle in the preceding letter. As a matter of fact the book did not get out until December.

Carlyle and his wife did go to the Barings in the middle of November, and the date of the following undated fragment thus swings between the 1st and the 15th of November. Carlyle says here that they were invited to the Grange; Froude, that Mr. Baring and Lady Harriet were at Bay House, in Hampshire. “Grange” is probably a slip of the pen.

XXXVI. CARLYLE TO HIS MOTHER, SCOTSBRIG.

CHELSEA [1/15 November, 1845].

. . . It lies perfectly ready, but the Town is still very empty; besides they are getting ready a Portrait, the rudiments of which John and I went to see the other day, but did not very much like. I fear it will not turn out much of an ornament to the Book or a true likeness of Oliver; but we cannot help that. Nor does it very much matter. — For the rest, I am and have been nearly as idle as possible; merely reading Books, and doing other small etceteras.

There is an invitation to go down to the Grange (where I was the other year), for Jane and me both, "for a few days" (perhaps three); but I think it is not certain whether we can accept in such a state of the weather, etc. It will be within the next ten days if at all. We are very quiet here at home; hardly anybody yet coming about us: and indeed in general it is, the fewer the better, with us.

I cannot yet learn with the least distinctness whether John is for Scotsbrig or not; but I continue to think he will after all come down and plant himself there with his Dante for a while. I have fully expressed your wishes to him in regard to that; and certainly if he do not come it will not be for want of wish to be there.

Jenny, I suppose, is home again: all is grown quiet in the upstairs rooms! My dear good Mother, let us not be sad, let us rather be thankful, — and still hope in the Bounty which has long been so benignant to us. I will long remember your goodness to me at Scotsbrig on this occasion, and the sadness that is in it I will take as inevitable, — every joy has its sorrow here. . . .

If I think of any Carlisle Tobacco I will send word about it in good time; if I send no word, do not in the least delay about it.

“In February, 1846,” says Froude, “a new edition was needed of the Cromwell. Fresh letters of Oliver had been sent which required to be inserted according to date; a process, Carlyle said, ‘requiring one’s most excellent talent, as of shoe-cobbling, really that kind of talent carried to a high pitch.’

“He had ‘to unhoop his tub, which already held water,’ as he sorrowfully put his case to Mr. Erskine, ‘and insert new staves.’”

Other editors of letters, before and since, have had such cobbling and coopering to do.

XXXVII. CARLYLE TO MRS. HANNING, DUMFRIES.

CHELSEA, Monday, 29th June, 1846.

DEAR JENNY, — I heard of your arrival in your new place at Dumfries a day or two ago, and on Saturday I sent you a newspaper which I suppose you will receive this morning. You will understand it as a hasty token that we are in our usual way and still mindful of you, although there has been little express writing of late.

No doubt you will feel a little lonely, unaccustomed, and now and then dispirited and anxious in your new situation. Yet I do consider it a very fit change for you to have made, and believe confidently you will find yourself much more comfortable than you have been in your old place, if once you are fairly hafted to the new one. Do not be discouraged, my little Jenny, I know you will behave always in a douce, prudent, industrious and wise way, and there is no fear of you, if so. You will be mistress of your own little heart at any rate, free to follow your own wisest purposes. I think you will gradually find work, too, which may be useful to you. In short this is a fact always, in Maxwell-town and in all towns and situations, — a person that does act wisely will find wise and good results following him in this world and in all worlds; which really is the comfort of poor struggling creatures here below. And I hope you understand firmly always that you have friends who will never forsake you, whom all considerations bind to help you what they can, in the honest fight you are making. So do not fear, my poor little sister; be wise and true and diligent and do the best you can, and it shall all be well yet, and better than we hope.

Getting into a new house, it strikes me, you must find various things defective and not yet in order, so you must take this bit of paper from me which James Aitken, on Wednesday first, will change into three sovereigns for you —and you must lay them out in furnitures and bits of equipments such as you see need-fullest. I know nobody that could lay them out better and make more advantage of them than you will do, only you want to consider that this is a supernumerary thing, a clear gift, and that your regular income (which John said was to be enlarged — whatever he may have settled it) will arrive at the usual time independently of this. And so, my blessing with you, dear little Jenny, and right good days to you in this new dwelling, — right wise days, which are the only good ones.

I have owed Jean a letter this long time. Tell her a box of supplements to Cromwell (one for each of you and two new copies of the whole book — one for my mother, the other for Jack) will reach her in a day or two, which she will know how to dispose of. For the rest, I am fast getting through my book, — it is mere tatters of work now, — and expect to be off northward before long. Northward we do mean; Jane sometimes talks of being off this week and I to follow in a week or two. To Seaforth, Liverpool, is Jane's first place. I, of course, will soon be across if once there. Good be with you, dear sister.

Yours always,

T. C.

Do you address the next newspaper to us if this come all right. That will be a sufficient sign to us.

XXXVIII. CARLYLE TO MRS. AITKEN, DUMFRIES.

CHELSEA, Saturday, 17th October, 1846.

DEAR SISTER, — That letter for the Doctor reached me last night with instructions, as you see, to forward it to you. There is another little one from poor little Jane, which I like still better, but I am ordered to return it to my mother. Alick is going on very tolerably and seems to do as well as one could expect in his new settlement, — somewhat bitter of temper yet, but diligent and favoured to see the fruits of his diligence.

We are extremely quiet here, not writing, or expressly meditating to write, resting in fact, for I find Chelsea greatly the quietest place I could meet with. This long while I read a great many books of very little value, see almost nobody except with the eye merely, find silence better than speech — sleep better than waking! My thoughts are very serious, I will not call them sorrowful or miserable; I am getting fairly old and do not want to be younger — I know not whether Jeffrey would call that “happy” or not.

Our maid Helen is leaving us, invited to be some Housekeeper to a brother she has in Dublin, at present a rich trader there, "all upon float" as I sometimes fear. Jane is busy negotiating about a successor, hopes to get a suitable one from Edinburgh or almost to have got such. You have not written to me. Tell Jenny I will send her some word soon. My kind regards to James. Good be with you and your house, dear Jean. Jane is out, and therefore silent.

Ever yours,

T. C.

Between 1846 and the spring of 1849 Carlyle had made the acquaintance of Louis Blanc, John and Jacob Bright, and Sir Robert Peel.

On the 30th of June, 1849, Carlyle started on a journey through Ireland, — the notes of which were printed after his death, — and returned on the 7th of August. He went directly to Scotsbrig, where, "owing to cocks and other blessed fellow-inhabitants of this planet," he was a good deal disquieted. In Scotsbrig he remained, however, till the end of August.

XXXIX. CARLYLE TO MRS. HANNING, DUMFRIES.

SCOTSBRIG, 18 August, 1849.

DEAR SISTER JENNY, — Here is a Draft for your money, which you will get by presenting that Paper at the Bank, when the Martinmas Term comes; I wish you much health and good industrious days till the 22nd comes round again; and have done nothing more gladly, I may say, in the payment line than write this little paper for you, ever since the last was written, I think. It gave me very great pleasure to see your neat little Lodging and thrifty, modest, and wise way of life, when we were in Dumfries the other day. The reports of all friends agree in testifying to the same effect. Continue so, my good little sister, and fear nothing that can befall. Our outward fortune, lucky or what is called unlucky, we cannot command; but we can command our own behaviour under it, and we do either wisely or else not wisely; and that, in real truth, makes all the difference, — and does in reality stamp us as either “lucky” or else “unlucky.” For there is nobody but he that acts foolishly and wrong that can, in the end, be called “unlucky;” he that acts wisely and right is, before all mortals, to be accounted “lucky;” he and no other than he. So toil honestly along, my dear little Jenny, even as heretofore; and keep up your heart. An elder brother’s duty to you, I trust I may promise, you shall never stand in want of while I live in this world.

Take the next Courier (which Jean will give you for the purpose) and address it in your own hand to me: “Care of John Fergus, M. P. etc., Kirkealdy,” — or in fact if James Aitken write that, it will be all the same, — and I shall need no other sign that you have received this Note and Inclosure safe. You can tell James to send only one Courier that way; but to direct the other to Scotsbrig till further notice.

Our Mother and I got well home on Thursday; the thunder-showers hung and fell heavy on all hands of us; but we escaped with little damage from them, — got no rain at all till we were on the top of Dodbeck (or rather Daneby) Banks; which rain was never violent upon us, and had as good as ended altogether by the time we reached the old Gildha Road. Our Mother’s new bonnet, or any of her clothes, suffered nothing whatever. There had been great rains here and all the way; the fields all running brooks, and the road-conduits hardly able to contain the loads they had. It was a good deal clearer yesterday; yet, in the evening, we had again a touch of rain, which I saw was very heavy over in Cumberland. To-day is a degree brisker still, tho' with remnants of thunder-clouds still hanging, so we fancy the "Flood" is about terminating, and the broken weather going to heal itself again. Jamie has some cattle rather suffering by the "epidemic," which, in the last year, has destroyed several; his bog-hay, too, is of course much wetted; but he is otherwise getting briskly enough along. You are to tell James Aitken that there is "an excellent spigot" here already for the water-barrel, so that he need take no farther heed of that, at least, till he hear again.

I could not quite handily get packed (owing to Garthwaites tailoring) for this day; so I put it off till Monday; and am fixed for that morning (10 A. M.) to be in Edinburgh about one o'clock and over in Kirkcaldy in good time, where Jane, as I conclude, is arrived since yesterday and expects me against the given time. Give my kindest remembrances in Assembly Street; what our further movements from Kirkcaldy are to be, Jean or some of you will hear in due time. No more at present, dear Sister, with many blessings to you all.

Ever your Affectionate Brother,
T. CARLYLE.

In 1850 the Latter-Day Pamphlets were published. In spite of the outcry against them, Carlyle's regular "public" was not disturbed. Froude estimates that about three thousand persons were then buying whatever Carlyle printed.

He wrote in his Journal during October of the same year: "Four weeks (September) at Scotsbrig: my dear old Mother, much broken since I had last seen her, was a perpetual source of sad and, as it were, sacred emotion to me. Sorrowful mostly and disgusting, and even degrading, were my other emotions. God help me!"

The next letter concerns the departure of Mrs. Hanning to join her husband in Canada. It is the only one in this collection from Mrs. Thomas Carlyle. "Jane" is Carlyle's sister, Jean Aitken, — Jane only by courtesy, he somewhere says.

XL. MRS. THOMAS CARLYLE TO MRS. HANNING, DUMFRIES.

5 CHEYNE ROW, Tuesday [spring of 1851].

MY DEAR JENNY, — I sent off yesterday by railway to Jane's care a bundle of things which I hope may be of some use to you in your preparation for departure. They are not much worth as they are, but you have a great talent — at least you had when I knew you — for making silk purses out of sows' ears, a very valuable talent in this world. For the rest what can I say to you but that I wish you good speed in your great adventure, and that it may turn out even better for you than you hope. Decidedly it is an adventure in which you ought to be let please yourself, to be let follow the guidance of your own heart without remonstrance or criticism of others. It is my fixed opinion that between man and wife no third person can judge, and that all any of us could reasonably require of you is that you should consider well what you are about to do and that you should do nothing from secondary motives. If it be affection for your husband and the idea of doing your duty by him that takes you from your family and friends so far away, then go in God's name, and may your husband prove himself worthy of so much constancy. In any case you will have no cause for self-reproach. But if it be impatience of your position here which is driving you away from your kind old Mother and all the rest who love you so well, then God help you, my poor Jenny, for you are flinging away all the real blessings of your lot for an imagination of independence. I hope, however, you are quite justified by your feelings towards your husband in leaving all to follow him. You have always seemed to me to cherish a most loyal affection for your husband, and I will never believe, however appearances may be against him, that a man can inspire such an affection in the wife he has lived years beside and yet be wholly unworthy of it. So farewell, dear Jenny, and God go with you.

JANE WELSH CARLYLE

Affectionately yours,

JANE CARLYLE.

Three months of the late winter and early spring of 1851 had sufficed for writing the life of John Sterling. Julius Hare and the religious newspapers had treated Sterling as a poor stray lamb from the Christian fold. Hare regarded him as "a vanquished doubter;" Carlyle, as "a victorious believer."

“Here, visible to myself for some while,” wrote he, “was a brilliant human presence, distinguishable, honourable, and loveable amid the dim common populations, among the million little beautiful once more a beautiful human soul, whom I among others recognised and lovingly walked with while the years and the hours were.” Carlyle’s life of the man whom he thus looked upon came out like a star after the storm of the “Latter-Day Pamphlets.” Full of a kind of shining peace, the work of an artist perturbed by neither controversy nor any need of “buffeting his books,” the Life of Sterling is one of the very few most beautiful biographies in English.

XLI. JOHN AITKEN CARLYLE TO MRS. HANNING, HAMILTON.

SCOTSBRIG, 27 June, 1851.

MY DEAR JENNY, — Mr. Smellie wrote punctually to tell us you had sailed on the 27th of last month exactly according to appointment, and that he had seen you on the day following some twelve miles down the Clyde, having gone to give you a Brooch you had forgotten in his mother’s house. He said your berths looked very comfortable, and spoke of the Clutha as a tight good ship, every way fit for the voyage. Almost every day since that time we have had westerly winds, and if you have had the same, your voyage is likely to be considerably longer than you anticipated. I hardly know whether to write by this week's post, or wait till next, but it seems best to err on the safe side, for you will expect to find a letter at Hamilton whenever you arrive, and be much disappointed if there be none. My writing need not be otherwise than briefly, as we are all going on in much the same way as when you left us. Our Mother has been uneasy whenever the winds were sounding loud, and once or twice she has taken to bed, but she is now at least as strong as usual and moving about in the old way. She desires me to send her love to yourself and the children, and kindest regards to your husband, and bids you write without delay whenever you get to your home in the far West. We had a note from Dumfries two days ago, Jean and hers are all well, James as busy as possible with one thing and another. We expect them here next week, and hope Jean will remain a few days. Mary was here on Tuesday last. She is looking stouter than usual and things seem to be a little more prosperous at the Gill than they have been of late years. I was there very lately along with Jamie, who went to purchase some cattle. From Chelsea we heard yesterday. Tom is busy with his Life of J. Sterling, which is now going through the press. He has not yet decided whether we are to expect him here or not this season. There is one of the Miss Welsh's of Liverpool staying with them at Cheyne Row.

Little Jamie takes this with him to Annan. I need not add any more except to mention that Mr. Goold had received a letter from your husband to you addressed to his care, a short time after you sailed. I will send you a paper now and then with its two strokes if we continue all well.

Our Mother sent a copy of the second edition of Cromwell's Letters to Mr. Smellie, the week after you sailed, and had an acknowledgement from him. She wished him to have some memorial from her, for all his kindness to you in looking after your berths, etc., etc.

Ever yours affectionately,
J. A. CARLYLE.

The following letter, interesting as it is, jars a little on the homely calm of the series. The Exhibition and the "glass palace" need no explanation. Church and State are still English facts.

XLII. CARLYLE TO ALEXANDER CARLYLE, CANADA.

CHELSEA, 24 Oct'r, 1851.

MY DEAR BROTHER, — About a fortnight ago I wrote to you intimating that I would soon send a copy of a Book called Life of John Sterling, which was just about coming out, and also that I would write soon again. Last week, in good time for the mail, said Life of Sterling did accordingly set out towards you. On enquiring practically I found such a feat was now quite handy. If the Book weighs under one pound, it will go to Canada or from it for a shilling; if under two pounds and above one, you must pay two shillings, (in stamps always), and so on for other weights. It is an immense convenience and I design if I live to make use of it on other occasions on your behalf. If all went right the book will reach you about a week before this present letter, if it do not, write to me and I will take some order in the matter. If it do come rightly you may send me an old newspaper addressed in your hand.

That will be announcement enough for the purpose, and so we have finished this affair of the Book, let us hope.

Since I wrote last our "Exhibition" has dissolved itself, all gone or going to the four winds, and on our streets there is a blessed tranquillity in comparison. London is of all the year stillest at this season or a little earlier. All one's acquaintances are in the country, two or three hundred thousand of the inhabitants are in the country. Now is the time for a little study, for a little private meditation and real converse with one's self — a thing not to be neglected, however little pleasant it be. The days are getting foggy, a kind of dusky, stoory-looking, dry fog, dimmed with much thin reek over and above, not an exhilarating element at all, but it is very quiet comparatively and one ought to be thankful. I often think I will go into the country to live, out of this dirty reek and noise, but I am very feckless for making changes and find all countries (Annandale itself) grown very solitary and questionable to me. "Busy, busy, be busy with thy work:" — let that in the meanwhile suffice as commandment for me.

Within the week I have news from Scots-brig. Our dear old Mother was reported well (for her) "better than when I was there." Jack being now with her, that is always a considerable fact in her favor. The good old woman, she can do wonderfully when things go perfectly "straight," but a small matter is now sufficient to over-set her. She can read, the whole day if she have any Book worth reading, and her appetite for reading is not at all sickly or squeamish, but can eagerly welcome almost anything that has, on any subject, a glimmering of human sense in it. Jamie's harvest is well over, a rather superior crop for quality, the quantity about an average, that is the account he gives — and indeed it is the general account of the country this year. Trade is good this year or more back; so that numbers of the people are or might be well off (tho' I think they mainly waste their superior wages) and huge multitudes of vagrant, distressed wretches are to be found everywhere even now. What will there be when "trade," as it soon will do, takes another turn. Strolling Irish, hawking, begging, doing all kinds of coarse labour, are getting daily more abundant — unhappy beings! We hear from the Newspapers much absurd talk about the "Millions that have emigrated to America." Alas, it has been to England and Scotland that they have "emigrated," as anybody but a Stump Orator or Newspaper Editor might see — and they will produce their effects here by and by! — On the whole, dear Brother, you are right happy to have got out of this horrible welter into a quiet garden of your own over the sea. There are times coming here, and rushing on with ever faster speed, though unnoticed by the "glass palace" sages and their followers, such as none of us have ever seen for violence and misery. Church and State and all the arrangements of a rotten society, often seem to me as if they were not worth 20 years' purchase and the thing that will first follow them is nearly certain to be greatly worse than they. God mend it. We can do nothing for it but try if possible to mind our own work in the middle of it.

There came a letter lately from Sister Jenny which reports of you at Bield in a very interesting and cheering fashion. You are not much changed except (like myself) a little whiter in the happits. Tom is a stout handy looking fellow, not too tall. Jane a douce tidy lass, in short "you look all very comfortable on your two farms." We were thankful enough for such a pictorial report, I need not tell you. As to Jenny herself there seem good omens too, and we hope her husband and she may now do well, his follies having stilled themselves with advance of years. At all events she will be more content than in Dumfries in her old position: there it was clear enough she could not abide much longer. That she is near you on any emergency is a great comfort to our Mother and the rest of us.

Adieu, dear Brother, I did not mean to write so much to-day, being hurried enough with many things. Jane sends her love to her namesake and to you all. I wish you would buy Tom an American copy of one of my books, (Translation of W. Meister? No?), and give it him as a memento of me and you, some time when his behaviour is at the best. Assure him, at any rate, of my hearty regard, him and all the household. My blessing with you all.

Affectionately,

T. CARLYLE.

By 1851 Carlyle had begun to think seriously of Frederick the Great as his next subject, and it soon became evident that he must walk in whatever footsteps of his hero were still visible. Carlyle reached Rotterdam September 1, 1852, at noon, and was there met by Mr. Neuberg, — “a German admirer,” says Froude, “a gentleman of good private fortune, resident in London, who had volunteered his services to conduct Carlyle over the Fatherland, and afterwards to be his faithful assistant in the ‘Frederick’ biography.” Carlyle returned to England in October, but many distractions — among them repairs in Cheyne Row and the funeral of the Duke of Wellington — kept him from starting with Frederick. During the winter he wrote something, and threw it aside. On the 13th of April, 1853, he wrote in his Journal, “Still struggling and haggling about Frederick.”

There is neither struggling nor haggling, however, in the letter which follows. The “Talbottypes” mentioned here were, like “Daguerreotypes,” dim and glimmering prophecies of the merciless photograph.

XLIII. CARLYLE TO MRS. HANNING, CANADA.

5 CHEYNE ROW, CHELSEA, LONDON,
22 Apl. 1853.

MY DEAR JENNY, — Though it is a long time since I have written to you, no mistake can be greater than that I have forgotten you. No, no, there is no danger of that. My memory at least is active enough! But I live in such a confused whirlpool of hurries here as you can have no conception of, and always in poor weak health, too, and in corresponding spirits, and for most part when my poor stroke of work for the day is done (if alas, I be lucky enough to get any work done one day in ten, as days now go!) — I have in general nothing for it but to shut up my ugly cellar of confusions and address myself to the task of being silent — writing no letter whatever but those I absolutely cannot help. That is the real truth and you must not measure my regard for you by the quantity I write, but by quite other standard.

We regularly see your letters here and are very glad indeed to observe that you get on so well. The fits of ague-fever you had at first were a severe introduction and began to be alarming to us, but I can hope now it was only the hanselling of you in your new climate, and that henceforth you will go on with at least your old degree of health. One thing I have understood to be of great moment

(indeed I am sure of it), in the Canada climate; it is to take good care that your house be in an airy situation, quite free from the neighbourhood of damp ground, especially of stagnant water, and with a free exposure to the wind. That undoubtedly is of great importance. You are accustomed from sound old Annandale to take no thought at all about such things, but you may depend upon it they are necessary and indispensable considerations in your new country. I beg you very much to keep them earnestly in view with reference to the house you live in. Plenty of dry wind, all marshes &c. at a distance, and there is no more danger of ague in Canada than in Scotland; that you shove up your windows in season and keep your house clean as a new pin — these are advices I need not give, for you follow these, of course, of nature or inveterate habit, being from of old one of the neatest little bodies to be found in five Parishes! In all remaining respects I find you have chosen clearly for the better, and I doubt not are far happier in your reunited household than you ever were or could have been in Dumfries. It was a wise and courageous adventure of you to take the Ocean by the face in search of these objects, and all your friends rejoice to learn that it has succeeded. Long and richly may you reap the rewards of your quiet, stout and wise behaviour — then and all along, under circumstances that were far from easy to manage; and God's blessing be on you always, my poor little Jenny! I hope, too, poor Robert has learned many a thing and forgotten many a thing in the course of his hard fortune and wide wanderings. Give him my best wishes, temporal and spiritual. Help him faithfully what you can, and he (for he has a kind enough heart) will do the like by you — and so we hope all will be better with you both than it is with many, and continue to grow better and better to the end. I recommend myself to the nice gleg little lasses whom I shall not forget, but always think of as little, however big they grow. My blessing on you all.

No doubt you know by eyesight whom these two Talbottypes represent; mine is very like — Jane's (done by a different process) is not quite so like, but it will serve for remembrance. I begged two pairs of them awhile ago and had one sent to Alick (Jane slightly different in his set), the other pair I now send to you and wish only it were some usefuller gift. However, they will eat no bread and so you may give them dry lodging, that is all they want.

I heard from the Dr. at Moffat the day before yesterday. He reports our good old Mother being in her usual way and now with the better prospect of summer ahead. Poor Mother, she is now very feeble, but her mind is still all there and we should be thankful. The rest are well. John is to quit Moffat in July. Jane sends her kind regards.

The White mat on Jane's lap is her wretched little messin-dog "Nero;" a very unsuccessful part of the drawing, that!

XLIV. CARLYLE TO MRS. HANNING, CANADA.

SCOTSBRIG, ECCLEFECHAN, 28 Dec. 1853.

MY DEAR SISTER, — This letter brings very sorrowful news to you, probably the sorrowfullest I may ever have to send from Scotsbrig. Our dear and good old Mother is no more: she went from us, gently and calmly at last, on the Sunday just gone (Christmas Day the 25th) at four or ten minutes past four in the afternoon: The Dr., Jean, Isabella, Jamie, and I standing in sorrowful reverence at her bed-side; our poor suffering Mother had lain in a heavy kind of sleep for about 16 hours before; and died at last, rather unexpectedly to the watchers, so sudden was it, without struggle or seeming pain of any kind. We had to think "Her sufferings are over; and she has fought her fight well and nobly; and as for us, — we are left here alone; and the soul that never ceased to love us since we came into the world, is gone to God, her Maker and ours." This is the heavy news I have to send you, dear Sister; and nobody can spare you the sorrow and tears it will occasion. For above a year-and-a-half past, our dear Mother had been visibly falling fast away; when I saw her in August gone a year, her weakness and sufferings were quite painful to me; and it seemed uncertain whether we should ever meet again in this scene of things. She had no disease at that time nor afterwards, but the springs of life were worn out, there was no strength left. Within the last six months the decay proceeded faster and was constant: she could not much rise from bed; she needed Mary and Jean alternately to watch always over her, — latterly it was Jean alone (Mary not being strong enough); and surely Jean has earned the gratitude of us all, and done a work that was blessed and beautiful, in so standing by her sacred task, and so performing it as she did. There has been no regular sleep to her for months past, often of late weeks and days not much sleep of any kind: but her affectionate patience, I think, never failed. I hope, though she is much worn out, she will not permanently suffer: and surely she will not want her reward. Our noble Mother too behaved like herself in all stages of her illness; never quailed into terror, lamentation or any weak temper of mind; had a wonderful clearness of intellect, clearness of heart, affection, piety and simple courage and beauty about her to the very end. She passed much of her time in the last weeks in a kind of sleep; used to awaken "with a smile" (as John described it to me), and has left a sacred remembrance with all of us consolatory in our natural grief.

I have written to Alick this day, a good many other details, and have bidden him send you the letter (which is larger and fuller than this), — as you probably in asking for it will send this to him. I am in great haste, to-morrow (Thursday 29th Dec.) being the funeral day, and many things occupying us still. I will therefore say no more here; your little pieces of worldly business will, I hope, be satisfactorily and easily adjusted before I return to Chelsea, and then it will be somebody's task (John's or mine) to write to you again. For the present I will only bid, God bless you, dear sister, you and yours; — and teach you to bear this great sorrow and bereavement (which is one chiefly to your heart, but to her a blessed relief) in the way that is fit, and worthy of the brave and noble Mother we have had, but have not any longer.

Your affectionate Brother,

T. CARLYLE.

With a few days excepted, the Carlyles spent the whole of the year 1854 in London. There was little but the Crimean war to distract Carlyle's attention from his long struggle with Frederick.

Early in this year was completed the much talked of "sound-proof room," of which the best account is given by Mr. Reginald Blunt, in his little-known book, "The Carlyles' Chelsea Home."

"The arrangement of this room, which was built in 1853, occupied by Carlyle till 1865, and afterwards used as a servant's bedroom, is clearly indicated on the plan; whilst Mr.

Tait's photographs (taken in 1857) give an excellent record of its aspect. Indeed, it is not often that so famous a literary workshop has been so faithfully depicted for posterity. The spacious skylight, which drove Carlyle to despair by besmutting his books and papers, gave his visitor the abundant light which indoor photography so often lacks, and the result is a series of pictures of wonderful interest. Mr. Tait was good enough to intrust the negatives to me to make my own prints; and it was, indeed, a fascinating employment to resuscitate, by a few minutes of exposure to light, these speaking records of the dead past of nearly forty years ago. By their aid we have little difficulty in mentally reconstituting the 'soundless room' as it was during Carlyle's 'thirteen years' war' there. Entering by the door at the head of the staircase (a second door opens into the cupboard space, though for what reason, unless to provide a means of escape, is not obvious), one finds immediately to one's right hand a third door into this same closet. Beyond it, against the partition wall, stood a half-round table with an oilcloth cover, carrying books and papers; above it hung a small portrait of Carlyle's mother, an engraving of Frederick on horseback, and a map, pinned on the wall, unframed. On the north wall, to the right of the fireplace, shelved cupboards were fitted. Over the square white marble mantelpiece, with its 'merely human' fireplace and white-tiled sides, hung several small sketches and engravings around the wooden pulley-board, to which were attached the lines for the sliding-shutter and the ventilators. On the left of the fire, above a circular silk-pleated screen, hung a paper rack and some written notes on Friedrich, probably chronological. On the mantel stood two white china candlesticks and a small bronze statuette of Napoleon. In the further corner, to the left of the fireplace, was a high upright cabinet with drawers for manuscripts, prints, etc.; and on the western wall there were bookshelves to right and left of the door leading into the closet behind the partition.

“Against the southern wall stood a low couch with loose leather mattress; while the eastern side, from the corner to the door, was occupied by a long, dwarf, three-tiered bookshelf, the upper half of which was filled with the works of Voltaire, in over ninety volumes. Maps, prints, and engravings, relating almost exclusively to the 'Life of Frederick the Great,' covered the available wall space; and in one corner stood the long hooked pole by which the balanced frames of the skylight could be opened and closed. Near the fireplace, a little to the left, was the place of the famous writing-table on which so much of noble work had painful birth. The photograph gives so exact an impression of its sturdy frame, its broad folding flap, its slightly boxed top, and back drawers, that no further description is needed either of it or the solid writing-chair. Hard by stood another little table on castors, which carried the books in immediate use (or such as were not on the floor!), while behind was the fourfold screen on which were pasted near a hundred old portrait prints, to which the maker of history always turned for insight and guidance in depicting his characters.

“When Carlyle gave up the use of this room, after the completion of his great history, the pictures, books, and furniture were dispersed elsewhere about the house, and later visitors will remember the writing-desk as standing in the drawing-room, the cabinet of drawers and little table in the dining-room, and many of the prints in the hall, staircase, and elsewhere, as indicated in the Picture List appended."

MARGARET A. CARLYLE

Carlyle's Mother

The 30th of September is given by Professor Norton as the date of Margaret Carlyle's birth, which was evidently unknown to her children when the following letter was written: —

XLV. CARLYLE TO MRS. HANNING, HAMILTON, C. W.

CHELSEA, 8 April, 1855.

DEAR SISTER, — I know not if you ever saw our lamented Mother's portrait which was done at Dumfries a good many years ago. It hangs in my room ever since, and has been very sad but precious company to me, as you may fancy, ever since the Christmas day of 1853! I have got seven copies taken of it (done by the machine they call photograph), and this is the one that falls to your share. I can well believe it will be very sad to you, dear little sister, but sacred, too, and very precious. You can easily get it framed in some modest cheap way; it may lie in the cupboard secure from dust till then. The birthday, "30th Sept.," was not quite certain; Roodfair in the year 1771 was held on the "25th of Sept.," and whether it was the "Monday after," or the "Monday before" (which would be 23rd Sept.), there was diversity of recollection. I myself and, I think, Jane inclined to think "after;" Jean thought rather the other way: so no date was put upon the Tombstone, — but perhaps you yourself have a better remembrance of what our Mother used to say on that point? Alas, we cannot settle it now, nor is that the important thing we have lost hold of in the change that has happened to us all! But let us not lament; it is far from our part to lament; let us try rather to bless God for having had such a Mother, and to walk always while in this world as she would have wished we might do. Amen, Amen.

There has been nothing wrong since the Doctor's sad loss. Jane and I, in particular, have not been worse than usual, though I think it was the severest winter I ever experienced (certainly far the worst I ever saw here), and has lasted, indeed, almost up to this time — "real spring weather" being yet hardly a week old with us. Sister Jean at Dumfries got a bad whitlow in one of her fingers; and the thrice unlucky blockhead of a Doctor she got there, cut away three times over some white substance he saw, which proved to be the sinew (sorrow on the fool), so that she has now no use of her (right hand) forefinger, though otherwise quite recovered again. She has learned to write with the next finger and makes no complaint.

The Doctor is here for sometime back, and I think may likely enough continue awhile, and perhaps draw hither as his main place. He lodges only about a mile off nearest the town, so I see him very often — almost every day in fact. He is very quiet, patiently composed, reads Books, writes letters, runs about; is chiefly occupied hitherto about his late wife's affairs, and the three boys (from 12 to 16) whom she left, who are all there staying with him (for a week or two) just now. Jane is pretty well, for her, and sends her kind remembrances to "little Jenny." I am very busy with work, but making hardly any way in it. Give my best wishes to Robert and the two little lassies whom I remember so well. Send me your own address (without "Gunn," etc., in it) when you write next. And fare right well, dear sister Jenny.

I am, your affectionate brother,

T. CARLYLE.

In May, 1857, Lady Ashburton died. Both as Lady Harriet Baring and as Lady Ashburton, she had been a friend to Carlyle but a cause of much unhappiness to his wife. Many years after her death Carlyle said of her, "She was the greatest lady of rank I ever saw, with the soul of a princess and captainess had there been any career possible to her but that fashionable one."

Carlyle made a second tour in Germany, in August, 1857, for the purpose of visiting Frederick's battle-fields. In September of the next year the first volumes of the book were published. In December Lord Ashburton married again, and the new Lady Ashburton became a fast friend to both Carlyles.

XLVI. CARLYLE TO MRS. HANNING, HAMILTON, C. W.

CHELSEA, LONDON, 7th January, 1859.

DEAR JENNY, — I got your letter acknowledging receipt of the Book; I have more than once got news of you that were welcome since I wrote last, though in general I tried to make some other of our kinsfolk give you notice. Indeed I have been inexpressibly busy for months and for years — with that frightful Book, and other burdens that lay heavy on me. I have in general lived perfectly alone, working all day with what strength remained to so grey a man, then rushing out into the dusk to ride for a couple of hours, then home again to Books, etc. It was seldom that I had leisure to write the smallest note. Indeed, I wrote none except upon compulsion — and never wrote so few in the same length of time on any terms before. I am again busy at the two remaining volumes, almost as busy and miserable as ever, but I cannot go on thinking of you (as you need not doubt I have often enough done) without sometime or other writing, and here has the time at last come by an effort of my own.

You must take this enclosed Paper to some Bank (John says “Any Bank in Canada will do,” and “perhaps even give a premium”), the Bank will change it into Canada money (with or without “premium”), and my little Jenny is to accept it as a small New Year’s Gift from her Brother. That is all the practical part of this present letter. My blessings conveyed aloud with it, if they could be of any avail, are known to you I hope always without writing.

Your Messenger, a very honest looking young man, called with the photographs of the two bairns whom I could hardly recognize, such strapping Hizzies were they grown; this is a long while since. I carried the photographs into Annandale with me, where also they were interesting. Mary at the Gill now has them, I believe. Give my affectionate remembrances to the originals whom I always remember as little bairns, though they are now grown big. May a blessing be on them, whatever size they grow to; and may their lot be that of good and honourable women, useful in their day and generation, and a credit to those connected with them. I am very glad to hear what you say of your household, and judge that you are doing well, tho' not so rich as some are. A little money before one's hand is very useful, but much is not needed. It is written "the hand of the diligent" does find chances, and "maketh rich," or rich enough. Give my best wishes to your Husband — my best encouragements to persevere in well doing.

The Dr^r was here a while ago; but he is off to Annandale again. He has four stepsons, (children of his late wife,) who form his main employment in late years and give him much writing and running about, with their schooling and affairs. The Austins, it was settled lately, are to stay in the Gill for another seven years, which we were very glad of. Scotsbrig and the other farmers are prosperous — a good time for farmers owing to new railways (I think), and Californian gold, which are resources that will not last for ever. Jean and hers are well. Her eldest son Jamie is, since some months, a clerk in a good mercantile house here and does very well. The Doctor his uncle procured him the place. My Jane has been very weakly for two winters past, but is a little stauncher this winter; a great blessing to us. I sent some books the other day to Alick's Tom; to Alick's self there went a Frederick at the same time as yours, but I have heard yet nothing of it, tho' I persuade myself it, too, is safe. My love to them by the first opportunity. God bless you all.

T. CARLYLE.

XLVII. CARLYLE TO MRS. HANNING, HAMILTON, C. W.

CHELSEA, LONDON, 30 April, 1860.

DEAR SISTER JENNY, — I have twice had a Newspaper from you lately, the last time only two days ago; and I am always glad to see such a mark of your remembrance, and understand by it that things are going tolerably well with you, or at least not going far out of course. I would write oftener, and I hope to do so by and by; but at present I am kept at such a press as you have not the least idea of; and, for months and indeed years past, I have had almost to cease corresponding with everybody; and have not, except upon compulsion, written the smallest Note, — every moment of my time being so taken up with another dismal kind of “writing” which I cannot shirk. It is of no use afflicting you with complaints of what you cannot help, or with pity for me which could do no good, but the truth is I never had in all my life such a frightfully undoable disgusting piece of work as this which has been reserved for the end of my strength, and it has made and makes me now and for years back miserable till I see it done. I stick to it like death and it shall not beat me if I can help it. No more of it here, — nothing of it, except to explain my silence; within a couple of years, if I live so long, I hope to be much more in case for correspondence with those whom I merely think of with affection, as times are.

To-day I have done a little thing which has been among my purposes for some time, namely, got a small memorial ready for you — which so soon as you have read this note you can go and ask for and so conclude. For the paper of the Messrs. Coutts, Bankers, I conclude, will go in the same steamer as this Note and all will be ripe by the time you have done reading. You are to go to the “Bank of Upper Canada,” Hamilton, to say you are “Mrs. Janet Hanning” and that there is £10 for you from “Mr. Thomas Carlyle, London” — upon which they will hand it out and so end. It is a great pleasure to me, dear little Jenny, to think of your getting this poor fairing from me, and stitching up for yourself here and there a loose tack with it — as I know you well understand how to do. Do not trouble yourself writing; address me a newspaper in your own hand and put one stroke on it, that will abundantly tell me whatever is to be said.

Your kindred here and in Scotland are all in their usual course. Nothing wrong with any of them, or nothing to speak of. My own poor Jane has by accident hurt her side a little the other day, which annoys her for the present, but we are promised a “perfect cure in less than four weeks.”

The new year took the Carlyles to the Grange again. "Everybody," Carlyle wrote, "as kind as possible, especially the lady. This party small and insignificant; nobody but ourselves and Venables, an honest old dish, and Kingsley, a new, of higher pretensions, but inferior flavour."

Visits in general, however, were rarer than ever in these years of "Frederick," to which every possible moment was devoted. Even Carlyle's letters to his kindred had grown fewer.

XLVIII. CARLYLE TO MRS. HANNING, HAMILTON, C. W.

CHELSEA, LONDON, 28 Feb'y, 1861.

DEAR JENNY, — The enclosed bit of paper has lain here for some days back, in the hope that I might find leisure to write you a couple of words along with it. With or without leisure, I had determined to send it to-day, (Friday, which is our American post day), but last night your pleasant little note from Hamilton arrived and that naturally quickened my determination. No man in all the world has less time than I, for these many months past and to come, and I write no notes at all unless like this in strictly exceptional cases.

Your account of your laying out the last little New Year's gift is touching and beautiful to me. I know you are a thrifty, gleg creature and wise thrift is becoming much a rarity in our time. The image of your tidy household and of the valiant battle you are fighting far away is worth many pounds to me. If the pinch become sharp at any time, fear not to apply to me. I know you are a proud little soul and somewhat disdain not to do your own turn yourself. All this is right: — nevertheless I expressly tell you (and pray don't neglect it), "send me word when the pinch threatens to be sharp" — which I hope it will not be, only if it is at any time observe what I say and mean here.

We are getting very feckless, Jane and I — partly by advancing years, partly, (in my own case), by such an unutterable quagmire of a job in which I have been labouring for about 10 years — and have still at least one year of it ahead if I live. Want of sleep, I believe, is the latest form of illness with me, latest and most frightful: — but I try to dodge it and have still (in secret) a surprising toughness in me for my years. Hope is rising too as the hideous months of a job done at last visibly diminish.

All the kindred in Scotland are well — under date three or four days ago. The Dr. is spending this winter in Edinburgh: — has still no hearth of his own but lives in lodgings, shifting about. Jean and her affairs are prosperous, thinking of “buying a house” &c. Jamie, her oldest boy, is a very douce, well-doing clerk in the City here for two years past or more. Young Jamie of Scotsbrig, owing to health, had to give up that and is now with his father thinking to be a farmer. Times are good with them at Scotsbrig, though our poor brother Jamie is in weak health and silently feels his “hervist endit.” Poor fellow! still I send my good wishes heartily to your good Robert. I am always, dear little Jenny,

Your truly affectionate,

T. CARLYLE.

In April, 1861, Carlyle went to hear Ruskin's lecture on “Leaves;” and in August, 1862, highly praised to Erskine the same writer's “Unto this Last.”

April 29, 1863, Carlyle wrote thus of one of Dickens's readings: “I had to go yesterday to Dickens's Reading, 8 p. m. Hanover Rooms, to the complete upsetting of my evening habitudes and spiritual composure. Dickens does do it capitally, such as it is; acts better than any Macready in the world; a whole tragic, comic, heroic theatre visible, performing under one hat, and keeping us laughing — in a sorry way, some of us thought — the whole night. He is a good creature, too, and makes fifty or sixty pounds by each of these readings.”

Carlyle's unfortunate horse, mentioned in the following letter, was Fritz. He was sold for nine pounds. Lady Ashburton supplied a successor, whom Carlyle called Noggs.

XLIX. CARLYLE TO MRS. HANNING, HAMILTON, C. W.

CHELSEA, LONDON, 13 Aug. 1863.

DEAR SISTER JENNY, — It is a long time since I have had on hand to send you the little bit of remembrance marked on the other page, but I am held in such a ferment of perpetual hurry and botheration here and have grown so weak and weary of my sad work, (till it do end), that I have seldom five minutes to dispose of in my own way, and leave many little jobs undone for a long time and many little satisfactions unenjoyed for want of a bold stroke at them. Finally I bethought me of the Dr. in Edinburgh and he has now got me your little paper into readiness for sending.

I understand you have nothing to do but present it at the Bank and at once get payment. If, (till you have time to write a long letter of news, which will be very welcome), you at once address me a Canada newspaper with three strokes, nothing more will be necessary in regard to this little bit of business.

I expect to get done with my book in six or eight months. O that I saw the day! I can and have been working thitherward with all the strength that I possess, to the hurt of my health as well, but I calculate when the end have once come I shall begin directly to improve more or less, and perhaps by degrees get very considerably better again. I had an excellent horse who had carried me 7 years and above twenty thousand miles, his hoofs were got spoiled on the stone hard roads. He came plunging down with me one day, (not throwing me nor hurting me in the slightest), — a most decided fall for no reason whatever—upon which I had to sell him (to a kind master for an old song), and for the last six weeks have been walking, which was a great enjoyment by way of change. It would not do, however, and since about a week I am mounted again: — very swift, very rough (in comparison to my old friend), but good natured, healthy, willing:—and must continue adding a dozen miles daily to the twenty thousand already done.

We have had such a winter for warmth as was never seen before, not very healthy, I believe, but it has agreed well with Jane:—and indeed the kindred, I think, are all well. Poor “Wullie Carlyle” (if you remember him at all) died lately at Edinburgh, an old man, as we are all growing hereabouts.

Tell Alick about my affairs and this last news you have had. That I never do or can forget him, he need not be told. I hope your lasses are doing well and that Robert and all of you are pushing along patiently, faithfully as heretofore.

In August, 1863, Mrs. Carlyle fell in St. Martin's Lane and broke her thigh. The accident resulted in long illness and pain. During the spring of 1864 she grew worse, and in March was taken to St. Leonards. From a subsequent trip to Scotland she returned in October to Cheyne Row, “weak, shattered, body worn to a shadow, spirit bright as ever.”

The last volume of “Frederick” was published in April, 1865. When the proofs were finished, Carlyle and his wife went to Devonshire for a few weeks with Lady Ashburton.

L. CARLYLE TO MRS. HANNING, HAMILTON, C. W.

CHELSEA, 4 May, 1865.

DEAR JENNY, — Two or three days ago, I saw a letter from you to Sister Jean; which was very welcome here, as bringing more definite news of you than we had got for a good while before. I have now got done with my Book (a copy of it probably in your hands before this); and am not henceforth to be so dreadfully hampered in writing a little note to my friends from time to time. I am still in a huge fuss, confusions of all kinds lying about me, and indeed I am just about running off for Scotland (to Jean's, in the first place), to try and recover a little from the completely shattered state these twelve years of incessant drudgery and slaving have reduced me to. But there is something I had meant, this long time and here it is — just come to hand. Inclosed is a Paper which will bring you the amount of Dollars for £20, on your presenting it at the Hamilton Bank. If by way of "identifying," they ask you who sends the money, you can answer with my name, and if further needful, add that the Negotiator for me with the Edinr. Bank, was Dr. Carlyle of that City. Nothing more, I suppose, if even that much will be necessary. Let me know by return that it is safe in your hand (a newspaper with three strokes will serve if you are short of time for the moment). And so with my best blessings, dear little Jenny, accept this poor mark of my remembrance.

My Jane is very frail and feeble, but always stirring about, and has got blessedly away out of the horrible torments she had (and all of you had on her account) last year. Scotsbrig, Gill, Dumfries, Edinburgh; all is going in the usual average way there. To you I can fancy what a distress the removal of your poor little Mary and her Husband to the Far West must be! These things happen and are inevitable in the current of life. That your son-in-law is a good man, this should be a great joy to you. Do not you be too hasty to follow to Iowa; consider it well first.

You see what a shaky hand I have; you do not see the bitter hurry I am still in! With kindest wishes to you and all your household,
Ever your Affectionate Brother,

T. CARLYLE.

Carlyle was elected Lord Rector of the University of Edinburgh in November, 1865; and on April 2, 1866, spoke his inaugural address at Edinburgh, of which the best account known to me — best for a general impression of Carlyle — is that given by Mr. Moncure Conway. On the 21st of April the news of Mrs. Carlyle's sudden death was brought to Carlyle at his sister's house in Dumfries. The epitaph which he wrote for her grave in the abbey church of Haddington ends with the words, "And the light of his life as if gone out."

An episode of the time when that light was fading will remain longer with some of us than most of the occurrences of Carlyle's life. Mrs. Oliphant has left a sketch, done with very few lines, of Mrs. Carlyle playing Scotch airs "to the tall old man in his dressing-gown, sitting meditative by the fire." Carlyle himself, in his Journal for December 3, 1867, described the last of these occasions: "One evening, I think in the spring of 1866, we two had come up from dinner and were sitting in this room, very weak and weary creatures, perhaps even I the wearier, though she far the weaker; I at least far the more inclined to sleep, which directly after dinner was not good for me. 'Lie on the sofa there,' said she — the ever kind and graceful, herself refusing to do so— ‘there, but don’t sleep,’ and I, after some superficial objecting, did. In old years I used to lie that way, and she would play the piano to me: a long series of Scotch tunes which set my mind finely wandering through the realms of memory and romance, and effectually prevented sleep. That evening I had lain but a few minutes when she turned round to her piano, got out the Thomson Burns book, and, to my surprise and joy, broke out again into her bright little stream of harmony and poesy, silent for at least ten years before, and gave me, in soft tinkling beauty, pathos, and melody, all my old favourites: ‘Banks and Braes,’ ‘Flowers of the Forest,’ ‘Gilderoy,’ not forgetting ‘Duncan Gray,’ ‘Cauld Kail,’ ‘Irish Coolen,’ or any of my favourites tragic or comic. . . . That piano has never again sounded, nor in my time will or shall. In late months it has grown clearer to me than ever that she had said to herself that night, ‘I will play his tunes all yet once,’ and had thought it would be but once. . . . This is now a thing infinitely touching to me. So like her; so like her. Alas, alas! I was very blind, and might have known better how near its setting my bright sun was.”

The following letter is shadowed with the death of Mrs. Carlyle, although nearly two years had passed.

LI. CARLYLE TO MRS. HANNING, HAMILTON, C. W.

CHELSEA, 14th February, 1868.

MY DEAR JENNY, — This is a little New Year's gift which I intended for you sooner. It (the essential part of it) has been lying here apart and wrapt up for you ever since Christmas time, but I never could get up to have it made into a banking, portable form till now, so languid, sad and lazy have I been! The banks all close at an earlier hour than my walking one, and it is rare that I can get so far into town in time. I am dreadfully indisposed to writing, and even my poor shaking right hand makes continual protest! I hope the poor little Gift will be welcome to you and in some savings bank or otherwise be innocently waiting to do you good some time or other! — I am told there will be no difficulty for you at the "Gore Bank" in Hamilton merely to go thither and sign your name. A newspaper with three strokes will sufficiently announce it for me till you have leisure for writing. I have also sent a photograph for nephew Tom's young wife, to whom, with all my affectionate regards to them both, pray send it by your first opportunity. There is another (if the letter will carry it), for yourself for your own free disposal otherwise.

THOMAS CARLYLE

I am not specially in worse health than usual, but excessively languid, dispirited, weary, sad and idle — especially in the late dark months of winter, which however are now gone, and indeed were never severe but lighter upon us than common. Jean has been here ever since early in December. It makes the house a little less lonesome to me than it has become for the last twenty two months, but cannot, as you may imagine, lift the heavy heart of me into anything of cheeriness, nor indeed perhaps should it. She will go home by Liverpool before long, where her son Jim (who is a clever solid fellow and has got promotion in Liverpool) is just setting up house with his sister Maggie as Manageress. Their mother will look in so soon as they have the home settled. All kinds of business are reported as utterly dull here; much distress among the idle poor — and a general silent anxiety as to this new “Reform Bill” or “Leap in the dark,” — poor stupid souls!

An extremely accursed atrocity of murder and worse has happened in Cummertrees, which has thrown all the community into horror and excitation — of which you will see or hear soon enough in the newspapers and probably know the location as I do. Your kindred in Annandale and here are all well and I can send their best regards.

Ever your affectionate brother,

T. CARLYLE.

In October, 1868, Carlyle was again thrown, — this time from a horse named Comet. A conversation with the Queen, the death of Mr. Erskine of Linlathen, and a letter to the Times newspaper on the Franco-Prussian war were among the events of the next few years.

Carlyle speaks again now of his shaking right hand. A few weeks after he quite lost the use of it for writing with a pen. “Mary Aitken,” ready to write to his dictation, was Mary Carlyle Aitken, daughter to his sister Jean.

LII. CARLYLE TO MRS. HANNING, HAMILTON, C. W.

5 CHEYNE ROW, CHELSEA, 13 Feb. 1871.

MY DEAR SISTER JENNY, — Here is a little bit of a present which you must accept from me ; it was intended for the New Year's time, but has been belated ; which will do it no great ill with you. Buy yourself something nice with it ; and consider at all times that my affectionate best wishes are with you ; and that if I could in any way do you a useful kindness, I gladly would.

We get a good few Canada newspapers from you ; welcome tokens of your remembrance : in one of the last, there was a very melancholy item of news marked by your hand, — the death of your dear little grandchild, poor Mary's Bairn ; we conceived painfully how sad it must have made you all ; and were ourselves sad and sorry. Poor Mary, she was herself a child when I saw her last, and she is now a bereaved mother : — Death snatches us from one another at all ages ! I often think with silent gratitude to Providence how gently we older ones have been dealt with in this respect ; saved, a whole family of us, for so many years ; none lost but poor Margaret, (very dear, and very sacred to me at this hour), and a wee wee Jenny whom you never saw, but whose death, and my mother's unappeasable grief for it, are still strangely present to me, after near seventy years. All we can say is, both the Living and the Dead are with God ; and we have to obey, and be of hope.

You regret sometimes that I do not write to you ; but it is not my blame, it is my misfortune rather. For rather above five years past my right hand has been getting useless for writing, (the left strangely enough, is still steady, and holds good) ; the weight of years, too, 75 of them gone December last, presses heavy on me ; and all work, but most especially all kinds of writing, are a thing I avoid as sorrowfully disagreeable. Mary Aitken, who drives an admirable pen, is indeed ever willing to be "dictated" to ; and I do, in cases of necessity, trust that method ; but find, on the whole, that it never will succeed with me.

From the Dr. and from Jean I believe you get all the news that are worth writing ; and that is the main interest in the matter.

The Dr. is in Edinburgh of late weeks, and seems to be enjoying himself among old friends :—and finds it, no doubt, a pleasant and useful interruption of his Dumfries solitude, to which he will return with fresh appetite. He is much stronger and cheerier than I ; five years younger, and at least twice five lighter of heart. He has an excellent lodging at Dumfries yonder ; and is of much service to all the kindred ; every one of whom he is continually ready to help. Mary Aitken has been here with me above two years :— a bright little soul, writing for me, trying to be useful and cheerful to me. I have plenty of friends here ; but none of them do me much good, except by their evident good-will ; company in general is at once wearisome and hurtful to me ; silence, and the company of my own sombre thoughts, sad probably, but also loving and beautiful, are wholesomer than talking ; these and a little serious reading are my chief resource. I have no bodily ailment, except what belongs to the gradual decay of a digestive faculty which was always weak ; except when sleepless nights afflict me too much, I have no reason to complain, but the contrary. This winter, now nearly done, has been a blustering, cold, inclement one as any I can latterly remember ; it grew at last to tell upon me as the unfriendliest of all its brethren :— but I think, after all, it may have done me little or no intrinsic damage. With the new Spring and its bright days I hope to awaken again and shake away this torpor of nerves and mind. I have long owed Alick a letter — that is to say, intended to write him one, though by count it is his turn. I often think of you all on that side the Sea as well as this; if that could do you any good. Alas! I will end here, dear little Sister; wishing all that is good to you and yours, as at all times. I am and remain,

Ever your affectionate Brother,
T. CARLYLE.

Send a newspaper with 3 strokes when this comes: don't trouble yrself with any other announcement.

In November, 1872, Emerson made his last visit to England. Carlyle was now reduced to writing "in largish letters with blue pencil." After the next letter he never wrote again with his own hand to Mrs. Hanning or to any member of the family across the Atlantic.

LIII. CARLYLE TO MRS. HANNING, HAMILTON, C. W.

CHELSEA, 2 Jan^y 1873.

DEAR SISTER JENNY, — I please myself with the thought that you will accept this little Newyear's Gift from me as a sign of my unalterable affection, wh^h tho' it is obliged to be silent (unable to write as of old) cannot fade away until I myself do! Of that be always sure, my dear little sister, — and that if in anything I can be of help to you or yours, I right willingly will.

“Clinthill’s” Photograph is wonderful and deeply affecting to me. Not one feature in it can I recognize as his: such are the changes half-a-century works upon us! If you have any means, send him my affectionate remembrances and unchanged good-wishes.

No more from this lame hand, dear sister Jenny, — except my heart’s blessings for the year and forever.

Y^r affect^d Brother,

T. CARLYLE.

LIV. MISS MARY CARLYLE AITKEN TO MRS. HANNING,
HAMILTON, C. W.

5 CHEYNE ROW, CHELSEA,
3 Feb. 1874.

MY DEAR AUNT, — Your little note arrived duly and was very welcome; telling as it did that all was well with you in your far off home. I have several times lately intended to write to you, spontaneously, but somehow one’s time seems to get so filled up that few of all the things one proposes to do get accomplished. I was very glad of the little note which you sent sometime ago in answer to one from me, and would have taken up Cousin Kate's Challenge as to writing, but had a great deal of writing to do at that time and was moreover in very indifferent health, — or I certainly should have written to her. I hope she is getting on well. We had a very good account of her from Alick and James Carlyle when they were here.

Uncle has been pretty well all the winter, until a fortnight ago, when he caught cold, which has troubled him a good deal; but he is getting rid of it now. Last August he and I went to Norfolk, and, after spending ten days very pleasantly there, during which time he seemed every day to grow younger and better, we turned our faces to the north. After a disagreeable journey to Newcastle by steamer, went on to Dumfries, where we found everybody well; from Dumfries we made several excursions, — to the Gill, where all were prospering, and especially Jane, who used to look rather thin and delicate, was looking very well. Aunt Mary is one of the kindest people one ever sees; she looked older than she did when I saw her before; and is generally rather serious than lively. They have got on their farm for another nineteen years at a very small increase of rent, which must be a great comfort to them. We one day went to Scotsbrig, where I have not been more than about three times in my life. John's wife, whom I never saw before, looks very amiable and gentle, rather than clever and smart; they have three children, one boy and two girls, one of the latter about the prettiest little thing I ever saw. Uncle Jamie had unfortunately made a mistake as to the day of our coming; so that we did not see him then; but he came to Dumfries and was looking very well; though, poor man, he has had a hard enough time of it since; for his daughter Jenny has been very ill all the winter; as it was she lost her little daughter; and last Sunday night poor Jenny's long, painful illness ended in death. I think she has left three children. It must be a cruel blow to Uncle Jamie, who always seemed so fond of her. We have been expecting no other news than this for some time back; but when death comes it never fails to surprise. There have been a great many deaths amongst us the last year or two; you are well off, dear Aunt, to have all your children spared to you. My Mother when I saw her in Summer did not seem to have forgotten those that were taken away. We used to be very fond of singing songs together in the evenings, but when we once tried it last time I was at home, one after another of us broke down until we had to give up the one solitary attempt. At Ecclefechan I went with the two Uncles to see the houses in which they were born and also to see Grandfather's and Grandmother's graves. I don't remember ever to have seen Ecclefechan before. It was a very interesting day we spent; none of us were in high spirits, as you may suppose; but it is very pleasant to me to look back upon the visit. Uncle and I went also to Fife to visit the Welsh's (Aunt Jane's Cousins) and after two or three days there we spent a day at Haddington; staid one night in Edinburgh and, after seeing one or two people there, returned to Dumfries, and after a week or two to Chelsea, — having been away in all only about six weeks. Uncle was not very well and complained of the noise of the railway whistle &c. at Dumfries; and so we were not sorry to be back to Chelsea again; I am hoping to get away for a week or two this spring to see them all at home, if Miss Welsh comes on a visit, as she may very possibly do. Uncle has not been working at anything lately ; he spends nearly all his time in reading. I am very glad to be back with him again, although I was sorry to leave the Taylors, who are very good people, and were most kind to me. I got on there very well, only I was in bad health nearly all the time. However, I am very much better now.

I have written this note, or rather long scrawl, in great haste ; and have been often interrupted, so I hope you will excuse it — as, if I read it over, I shall be sure not to send it off and have not time at present to write another. Uncle sends his kindest love and best wishes, as well as thanks for your kind letter, with all good messages from myself.

Ever, dear Aunt,

Your affectionate

MARY CARLYLE AITKEN.

During the month in which the last letter was written, Carlyle received the Prussian Order of Merit, and, later in the year, refused the Grand Cross of the Bath, offered by Disraeli.

“Bield” was the name of Alexander Carlyle’s farm.

LV. CARLYLE TO MRS. HANNING, HAMILTON, C. W.

5 CHEYNE ROW, CHELSEA,
12 April, 1875.

MY DEAR SISTER JENNY, — It is a long time since I have heard direct from you; and a good deal longer since I wrote myself. But we see all your letters to the Dr., yours and your children's; and I hope and indeed even know, that you never doubt of my brotherly remembrance and affectionate thoughts of you all. Silent my thoughts are obliged mostly to be, for my hand this long while back is quite useless for writing and indeed even by dictation I never do write except on absolute compulsion. This time I send you a small practical memorial of which you will see the nature from Adamson the Banker's little note enclosed; which I hope you will have no difficulty in negotiating and turning into dollars. Pray accept it kindly, and lay it out in buying yourself any little thing you find useful or agreeable to you, — or lay it by if you like better, added to any little pose of your own against a rainy day. Do not trouble yourself with writing any answer; merely send me an old newspaper, addressed in your own hand with three strokes, which will be taken as a sure sign that you have got it all right.

I have grown very old (now getting fast forward with my 80th year) and am very weak and useless, as is natural; but by blessing from above, still wonderfully keep my health, what health I could expect to have; and have suffered little or nothing by the late severe winter, which also I find has been so severe with you. Take care of yourself in the bitter cold when it comes again; and above all provide yourself with effectual warm clothing. I read with interest your daughter Mary's letter: and was glad after all that you had been so kind as to go to Bield on report of Billy Bobby, tho' the reception there was not quite of the kind one could have wished. Alas, alas! Perversity is born with us all, and comes out in little touches, where we least expected it. The one remedy is to crush it down each of us for himself, and in respect of others to forgive and forget. Our spring here is very tardy; the weather still damp, chill and disagreeable. I hope it may be much brighter with you, thanks to your deep, clear skies; not drowned in mist like ours, and that it may be shining summer when this arrives. This morning we had a letter from the Dr. who reports all the kindred well. He proposes to come up hither about the end of the month; he has been much more quiescent this season than I have often known him; but is about to move at last. God bless you always, dear Jenny, you and yours.

I am and remain

Ever your affectionate Brother

T. CARLYLE.

Carlyle's eightieth birthday — December 4, 1875 (year of "Early Kings of Norway" and "Portraits of John Knox") — was celebrated with a memorial from his friends and "a whirlwind of gifts and congratulations." In February, 1876, John Forster died, and in April Carlyle's brother Alexander. Carlyle wrote in his Journal: "Young Alick's account of his death is altogether interesting — a scene of sublime simplicity, great and solemn under the humblest forms. That question of his, when his eyes were already shut, and his mind wavering before the last finis of all: — 'Is Tom coming from Edinburgh the Morn?' will never leave me should I live a hundred years. Poor Alick, my ever faithful brother! Come back across wide oceans and long decades of time to the scenes of brotherly companionship with me, and going out of the world as it were with his hand in mine. Many times he convoyed me to meet the Dumfries coach, or to bring me home from it, and full of bright and perfect affection always were those meetings and partings."

The last bit of Carlyle's writing printed during his life was a letter to the "Times," in May, 1877, on the Russo-Turkish war. In the same year Boehm made a statue of Carlyle, and Millais a portrait.

"24 Cheyne Row" was the new (and present) numbering of Carlyle's house.

LVI. CARLYLE TO DR. JOHN CARLYLE, DUMFRIES.

24 CHEYNE ROW, CHELSEA,
21 Sep. 1878.

MY DEAR BROTHER, — We got your letter this morning, and were very glad to hear that things went so tolerably with you in your present sad imprisonment. We had not the bit of bad weather you speak of, or had it only in a milder type. We also get out daily in a drive of two hours which might be pleasanter were we in better circumstances to enjoy it, but it does us good and forms a variety in our rather stagnant ways. I also contrive to get some modicum of sleep every night and have now got rested from the great confusions of our journey hither, in which till Crewe we could get no place to ourselves. The scene on Carlisle platform was beyond all others I have seen the most chaotic and disturbing to me. The Town seems quite empty of people we have business with. We have seen only Blakiston and his Bessy Blakiston is as nonsensical as formerly. He spoke of writing to you, but I know not whether he has done it. His knowledge about your circumstances seems to me to amount to zero. Yesterday we called at Darwin's door, heard he was in his usual way of health, but as nephews of his had just driven up to his door, we did not venture in. Froude is still at Saltcombe for a month to come. Till then does not make his appearance here. I have nearly done my reperusal of Frederick and know not what book next to apply to. But something I will devise for that poor purpose. The Town is very empty, but begins in a slow way to repeople itself.

We are much concerned to hear by James of Newlands that poor Austin lies at the Gill in dangerous circumstances; jaundice is the last figure of his illness. May, it appears, is in her usual way. Here our weather is generally good and I often have a walk down to the bottom of the embankment, which is strange and I suppose salutary to me. A sad thought to me in this operation is that, alas, you cannot share it with me, or for the present enjoy anything like it. No word from Canada, but certainly some must be coming. My kindest love to Jean. Tell her if I had a hand, she should not long expect a letter from me! With kindest love to one and all of you,

I ever am

Your affecte Brother,

T. CARLYLE.

Will you kindly send Emerson back when everybody has done with it.

John Carlyle died in 1879. Carlyle was now growing steadily weaker, and by October of 1880 was under the constant care of a physician.

Mary Aitken, by marriage with her cousin Alexander Carlyle, was now become "Mary Carlyle."

LVII. MRS. ALEXANDER CARLYLE TO MRS. HANNING,
HAMILTON, C. W.

24 CHEYNE ROW, CHELSEA,
18 July, 1880.

MY DEAR AUNT, — I received my Cousin Mrs. Baird's letter about ten days ago, asking for tidings of my Uncle. I am extremely sorry that you have been made anxious about him through my not writing; but indeed there have been many sufficient apologies for my want of punctuality in that way, which, however, I need not trouble you with here. It will suffice to say that I use the very first chance I have had to answer your enquiries.

It is not very easy to explain to you exactly how Uncle is. He is exceedingly weak, hardly able to walk fifty yards without help, and yet until about ten days ago, when he had a very severe attack of Diarrhœa which has left him much below par, he was what one might call for him very well. He generally spends his mornings till about half past two o'clock between lying on the sofa, reading in his easy chair, and smoking an occasional pipe; at half past two he goes out to drive for two or two and a half hours, sleeps on the sofa till dinner time (half past six) then after dinner sleeps again, at nine has tea, reads or smokes or talks, or lies on the sofa till bed time, which is usually about midnight, and so ends the day. He looks very well in the face, has a fine, fresh ruddy complexion and an immense quantity of white hair, his voice is clear and strong, he sees and hears quite well; but for the rest, as I have said, he is not good at moving about. In general he is wonderfully good humored and contented; and on the whole carries his eighty-four years well. He desires me to send you his kind love, and his good wishes: as you know, he writes to nobody at all. I do not think he has written a single letter, even dictated one, for over a year.

JANET CARLYLE HANNING

At the age of 82

We are very glad to hear that all is well with you and with all your family. I have not time for more just now, as I am interrupted. Good-bye, dear aunt.

I am, Your affectionate Niece,

MARY CARLYLE.

Carlyle died on the 5th of February, 1881. The Abbey was offered, but refused; and, as the world knows, Carlyle was buried in the kirkyard of his native Ecclefechan. The following narrative of the funeral is from the pen of Mr. John Carlyle Aitken, brother to Mary Aitken Carlyle.

One likes his letters less than his sister's, which are perfect in their unaffected plainness.

The three remaining letters need neither explanation nor comment.

LVIII. MR. JOHN CARLYLE AITKEN TO MRS. HANNING,
HAMILTON, C. W.

THE HILL, DUMFRIES, N. B.
11 Feb., 1881.

MY DEAR AUNT, — Today I mean only to write a note of the more needful details, reserving for a more fitting time the full statement. I need not worry you with the account of my tempestuous voyage from New York, in which I made acquaintance with a hurricane, and its full meaning — nor how glad I was at sight of the dear bare and rugged hills of my native land — Leaving America to the Americans — and welcome! I shall think for sometime ere I do the “her-ring-pond” again! Well, no more of that if you love me! no more o’ that! I am home, and well, and likely to remain there for the remainder of my days in one shape or other. Let that serve just now on that score.

You would observe the date of Uncle's death and might hear of it the same day, as I thought. At all events The Scotsman would supply more details; and that I hope reached you all right. All has been in such hurry, bustle and confusion ever since that no one has had time to think of writing anything requiring time or calm consideration. Uncle had not been considered seriously ill more than about a fortnight or so before the end. The vital spark of life towards the last days kept flickering in a way so extraordinary that the Doctor declared he had never met such tenacity of life and vitality in the whole course of his varied London and other experience. Dear Uncle, the good, true and noble old man that he was, really suffered little in the way of pain for some weeks before his death, which was itself little more than a gentle flickering sleep, ending in a scarcely heard last sigh of sound. While lying in a comatose or unconscious state his mind seemed to wander back to old Annandale memories of his ever loved ones and their surroundings; his mother holding her supreme seat surrounded by a trooping throng of once familiar faces, not very greatly less dear to him. He died full of years, with all his weary task of world's work well and nobly done, and leaves no mortal behind him who does not love and reverence his life and memory.

By the newspapers I send today you may see how very quiet the funeral yesterday was. The vale of Annan was grim and wintry. You could catch a glimpse of Hoddam, the Brownmuir, Woodcockaigne, and all the old places through the white rousy mist hanging over and round them. The most touching sight I saw was that of three gray haired, smooth crowned fathers of the village of Ecclefechan, who stood together by the wayside, bare-headed and with unfeigned sadness of face and manner silently and impressively bearing witness to their sorrow. It was really very touching to look upon. The Presbyterian Kirk bells tolled mournfully as they laid him gently in the bed of rest within a few yards of the place where he first drew the breath of life, and all was as unostentatious as he himself desired it might be. Ah, me! Ah, me! Uncle James was there, as the last male link of the ever shortening chain. Mother bids me send her love to you and your fellow mourners who here and over all the wide world are many. All would gladly unite in sympathy and love with you in your far away home.

Ever affectionately,

JOHN C. AITKEN.

LIX. MRS. ALEXANDER CARLYLE TO MRS. HANNING,
HAMILTON, C. W.

24 CHEYNE ROW, CHELSEA,
3 March, 1881.

MY DEAR AUNT,—Alick received two kind notes from you and Kate, which I will answer as well as I can. The news itself you would receive almost too soon! When we were at Dumfries (where we stayed from Thursday till Monday) John wrote to you and told you some particulars, no doubt more will be welcome, and it would have been natural we should have written ere this, but there has been little composure to write to anyone, and a very great many letters coming every day to be attended to in one shape or another. Last July, as I think I told you, Uncle had a short though rather bad turn of illness evidently brought on by the heat; he seemed to a great extent to recover from it, but he never got up any considerable strength after it; he seemed to grow a little weaker month by month and week by week. He was out on New Year's Day for the last time, a short drive of an hour or so; he complained of the fatigue very much after he came back. He was confined to his bed exactly three weeks all but a day. Until the last few days he was, though now and then delirious, for the most part quiet and collected, and able to talk to us, which he did with great kindness and affection. For the last two days and nights he was in a deep unnatural looking sleep, and except once when he seemed to be trying to speak to us, and he said distinctly "Alick" — and "Woman," he hardly once looked up or moved. On Saturday morning about eight (Alick and I having both sat up with him) I was in the room alone, and at 8.30 I noticed a change in the breathing, at first it seemed to stop, then there were one or two louder breaths and all was over. In the last few days his mind seemed to turn altogether to the old Ecclefechan days; he often took Alick for his Father (Uncle Sandy) and he would put his arms round my neck and say to me, "My dear Mother." His was a great and noble life. I have no words to tell how much I miss him and how sad I feel now that he is gone. I am sure you would get a great shock when you heard of it. We have formed no plans yet for the future, but we mean to keep together all the furniture and Books in memory of him as long as we live and not to sell any part of them.

In Scotland we found them all pretty well. John [her brother] was there as you know, looking no worse for his multifarious adventures in America. He spoke enthusiastically of your kindness to him for which we are all most grateful to you. They then spoke of writing to you very shortly. Alick and I drove to the Gill one afternoon and found them all pretty well there. Aunt Mary, though complaining of a bad cold, looked as well as when I saw her before. The other branches of the family were well, but as we had so little time I did not see any of them. I went with the funeral to the gate of the Kirkyard at poor old Ecclefechan; but I kept behind the curtain in the carriage, and saw, or was seen by nobody. I hope to send you some little memorial of him and I will not forget Kate's request for some little thing of the kind. I hope all is well with you and yours, dear Aunt, and that you will excuse me if I have failed to tell you anything that would be interesting to you. Give Alick's thanks and his and my kind regards to Kate, and with many kind regards to you all,

I am,

Ever your affectionate Niece,

MARY CARLYLE.

An anonymous writer sent to the Pall Mall Gazette in 1885 a record of travel in Dumfriesshire, with the title Carlyle's Country. A selection from it follows:—

“The next point in my pilgrimage was Mainhill, a farmhouse about two miles from the village of Ecclefechan. Here, again, I fancy Mr. Froude gives a rather erroneous impression. The situation is not very bleak or cheerless, nor very high; but perhaps he may have judged of it by the day he visited the place—on the day when Carlyle was buried. I was told—my informant being no other than the man who had tolled the bell for the funeral—that it was a ‘clarty day:’ and as the term was to me technical, I had it amplified: ‘It blawed, it snawed, an’ it rained, an’ sleeted. O, it was verra clarty!’

“On such a day I can well understand that Mainhill would be dreary enough. It was damp and wet the day I was there, and I carried away from the farm road dust, in the shape of mud ankle deep, that refused to be shaken off. The house must have been small indeed for such a family as the Carlyles: only three rooms of any kind for all purposes, no 'upper ben' at all: apparently the sleeping accommodation was arranged as on shipboard, by berths one above the other. It was at Mainhill that Carlyle spent his vacations during his schoolmaster's and tutorship period: the most miserable and unhappy period of his whole life. Wandering upon the hills above Mainhill he meditated on his unsuccessful efforts at getting under way, and had it not been for the kindly and tolerant refuge he here found, he might well have ended in despair all his valorous attempts to 'open his oyster:' as it was, he says, 'almost had I desisted, as obstinately did it continue shut.' When the early romance of his first love was rudely ended, these hills witnessed the weary and hopeless journeyings which are magnified into the world-wide wanderings of the sorrows of Teufelsdröckh. Here he heard pealing in his ears the everlasting No, and sank into the centre of indifference, and finally emerged into the calmness of the everlasting Yea. I purposed, with these thoughts as comrades, a walk over these same hills, Burnswark and its neighboring heights

—but alas! the heavenly powers forbade, the landscape was blotted out by foul mists, and the drenching rain descended and effectually drove me back. Gladly did I take refuge in the railway station, and more gladly, though stiff with cold and weariness, did I enter the kindly hostelry at Dumfries, where I ate the repast of the hungry, and slept the sleep of the laboring man, which is sweet, whether he eat little or much.”

After describing Craigenputtock, the writer in the Pall Mall Gazette continues: —

“It struck me as a little strange that in a house so associated with Carlyle, given by him to his own university, there should be no mark or token of the connection. Surely the university might make some little acknowledgment to the memory of the donor in the house he had given. If there were a good engraving of him, or a copy of his works — some memento, however slight — it would appear more gracious. But the stranger might come and go away and never know that Craigenputtock was bequeathed to the University of Edinburgh by Thomas Carlyle. I next retraced my way over the moor and down to the valley. I changed my route here, wishing to see Auldgarth Bridge, and to go by Templand to Thornhill, and thence to Annan once more. Auldgarth is hardly more than a mile from Ellesland, and again it seemed hard to tear one's self from Burns, but I had not leisure for both. From Thornhill the steam engine whirls me back to Dumfries and on to Annan once more. I had only one more spot to visit, Scotsbrig, near Ecclefechan, and I could spare no more than another day: by taking an early train from Annan to Kirtlebridge and thence walking by Birrens and Middlebie, I could accomplish my purpose. It was still early — before nine o'clock — when I reached the farm house of Scotsbrig, the house of Carlyle's parents after their removal from Mainhill, and then of his youngest brother James till a few years ago. My reception here was anything but hospitable. I felt myself looked upon with suspicion as some kind of a tramp, and to none of my questions could I get more than a monosyllabic answer. The morning was raw and damp and ungenial, a drizzling rain was falling, and I soon left Scotsbrig, with no very pleasant recollections. The farm house is prettily situated on a little bluff overhanging the burn, which tumbles over the rocks in a pretty little cascade just below the house. A tramp through the muddy roads brought me again to the railway, and my pilgrimage was over."

LX. MR. JOHN CARLYLE AITKEN TO MRS. HANNING,
HAMILTON, C. W.

THE HILL, DUMFRIES, N. B., 11 May, 1890.

MY DEAR AUNT, — Although long ere this reaches you, you will have heard the sad news of the death of Uncle James of Scotsbrig, at John Carlyle, his son's farm, of Pingle, some ten miles nearer the English Border than Ecclefechan, on Sunday morning the fourth of May at two o'clock.

I know that you may like to hear anything in the shape of details. We were all very sad to think that the last brother was gone, although in the course of human things otherwise the time could not have been greatly extended. He had been pretty well confined to the house and to his bed for seven weeks or so before, and John C. seemed to say that the end was rather painful, on account of his sufferings which no human aid could materially alleviate, than unexpected in any way. The funeral was at Ecclefechan on Wednesday the seventh, or that is to say, some three days after his death. And I was the only nephew present and the others were grandsons, two of Craigenputtock and three of John's own sons, all nice lads. The train started from Pingle at eleven, coming to Ecclefechan by way of Waterbeck and Middlebie, by a not very good road in any part, and I noticed when we got into Ecclefechan the school-house clock stood at twenty minutes to two. There were a great number of people at the funeral in gigs and on foot, a good number from Ecclefechan had gone about a mile out towards Middlebie to meet. It was a cloudy sunny morning with great black clouds which threatened rain all day although there was not any, and the sun's rays came darting through a greyish mist in long streaks of light which threw into relief Repentance Hill, Woodcockaigne, and the silent-looking steeples and roofs of Ecclefechan itself, in a strange way. As I arrived at Ecclefechan by the train from Dumfries which reached there shortly after ten without finding anyone else going there on the same sad errand, I walked by the Common and avoided the Main Street and so on to the Kirkyard.

At the funeral there were few, even among the goodly sprinkling of older men, whom I knew either by sight or by name, and who were of the older generation. A number of the younger ones I knew, or could guess the names of, as people once around about Scotsbrig and Middlebie. One notable figure called "Auld John Kennedy, the Post," was pointed out to John Carlyle for some recognition as having been at school with Uncle James. A queer looking little man of small bulk and stature, and with a pair of small restless eyes which under the excitement of the moment appeared as if they might loup out of his head. I should think he must have been on the borders of ninety years of age by his appearance. The all absorbed interest and the earnestness of the old man's gaze into the proceedings as he held both his withered hands clenched to the top of the iron railings, was as impressive as it was wae and touching to look upon. So soon as he might — John Carlyle went to shake hands with him, and I did so too. So soon as the funeral was over I instantly took leave and found a relief in walking from Ecclefechan all the way to Lockerbie, rather than wait about for hours for a suitable train. I glanced at Main Hill in passing, but as there is an addition in the shape of a new dwelling house of red sandstone, and a couple of stories high, I was not certain about its identity at first, until I had it confirmed by after inquiry.

I hope you have been in as fair health as you could wish and I could sincerely wish, who have often thought of you and yours, to all of whom please offer my loving wishes. All here are well and would wish to send their love also. Ever affectionately,

J. C. AITKEN.

I give here the conclusion of Mr. Reginald Blunt's account of the movement to preserve Carlyle's house : —

“The canvass was pushed vigorously forward from the beginning of 1895. Circulars and letters were widely distributed, the assistance of libraries throughout the country was invoked, and, by the invitation of the Lord Mayor, a crowded meeting was held at the Mansion House at the end of February, and addressed by Lord Ripon, the United States Ambassador, Mr. Leonard Courtney, Mr. Leslie Stephen, and Mr. Crockett. Funds came in slowly, but steadily ; auxiliary committees were formed in New York and in Glasgow, and over £400 was remitted from America. By the end of April about £2000 had been collected, sufficient to complete the purchase, pay the expenses of the fund, and carry out part of the essential repairs. The freehold of the house was accordingly bought in May, and, after a careful survey of its actual condition, the necessary works were put in hand at the end of the month, and completed in June.

“The end of the season in London, and the occurrence of a General Election in July, rendered the arrangement of any opening ceremony impossible, and the House was therefore opened informally at the end of July, and was visited by over a thousand persons, from all parts of the world, during the next six weeks.”

In December, 1897, at the age of eighty-four, died Janet Carlyle Hanning, the last surviving Carlyle of her generation. As the reader has seen, many of the foregoing letters were addressed to her. Those which had passed between other members of the family, and were afterward either carried by her beyond seas or sent to her in Canada, were preserved by Mrs. Hanning as precious memorials of family affection.

INDEX

INDEX

- AITKEN, Jean Carlyle, letter to, 190.
- Aitken, John Carlyle, letters of, to Mrs. Hanning, 256, 266.
- Aitken, Mary Carlyle, Carlyle's amanuensis, 238; letter to Mrs. Hanning, 243; married to Alexander Carlyle, 253. See, also, Mrs. Alexander Carlyle.
- Annandale, Carlyle's fondness for, 26, 202; funeral scene at, 258.
- Ashburton, Lady, 220; generosity of, 229.
- Austin, Mrs. James, letter to, 169.
- Bield, 204, 249.
- Blunt, Reginald, The Carlyles' Chelsea Home, 213.
- Boehm, his statue of Carlyle, 251.
- Bullers, the, 86; Carlyle's visits to, 102, 133.
- Carlyle, Alexander, birth of, 39; proposed emigration of, 80; at Ecclefechan, 88; in America, 163; letter to, 201; death of, 250; Carlyle's lament on, 250.
- Carlyle, James, birth of, 39; "Maister Cairlill," 43; his farm, 81, 82; in old age, 245; death of, 266; burial of, 267.
- Carlyle, Jane Welsh, wit of, 25, 51, 100, 108; her marriage with Carlyle, 43; ill-health of, 78, 97, 178, 223; letter from, to Mrs. Hanning, 196; her view of marital duty, 197; accident to, 231; death of, 234; burial-place of, 234; Carlyle's memory of her music, 235.
- Carlyle, Janet, birth of, 39; marriage of, to Robert Hanning, 37; housekeeping skill of, 40; helpfulness of, 41; letter to, 43. See, also, Hanning, Janet Carlyle.
- Carlyle, Jean, birth of, 39; home at Dumfries, 83. See, also, Aitken, Jean Carlyle.
- Carlyle, John, birth of, 39; physician to Lady Clare, 52, 57; in Rome, 69, 78, 82; in London, 122, 124; letter to, 172; translation of Dante, 182; later life of, 219, 240; letters to, 172, 251; family of, 219; death of, 253.
- Carlyle, John Aitken, letter from, to Mrs. Hanning, 198.
- Carlyle, Margaret A., her love for her children, 27, 29; death of, 31, 210; letters from, to Mrs. Hanning, 63, 75, 93, 147; to Carlyle, 146; her religious feeling, 65, 75, 93; letters to, 102, 112, 118, 124, 127, 132, 148, 154, 156, 160, 162, 177, 180, 182, 185; difficulty at writing, 146; fondness for books, 203; birth of, 217; portrait of, 217.
- Carlyle, Mrs. Alexander, letters from, to Mrs. Hanning, 254, 259.
- Carlyle, Thomas, his melancholy, 6, 53, 60, 99, 195; humor, 9; dislikes, 10; likes, 12; mysticism, 16; religious faith, 16, 31, 44, 164, 211, 239; opinion of the literary world, 18; pension offered, 18; habit of scorn, 19; realism of, 20; portraits of places, 21, 29, 49, 133; portraits of persons, 23, 24, 86, 93, 99; style, 25; burial-place, 32; birth of, 42; attends Edinburgh University, 42; marriage, 43; letters from, to Mrs.

- Hanning, 43, 52, 61, 66, 77, 87, 96, 105, 109, 115, 129, 150, 175, 187, 192, 206, 210, 217, 220, 223, 226, 229, 232, 236, 238, 242, 248; to his mother, 102, 112, 118, 124, 127, 132, 148, 154, 156, 160, 162, 177, 180, 182, 185; to Edward Fitzgerald, 143; to Mrs. Austin, 169; to John Carlyle, 172, 251; to Mrs. Aitken, 190; to Alexander Carlyle, 201; his life in Edinburgh, 46; goes to London, 48; poverty, 49, 103, 120, 123; delivers lectures, 74, 98; his horses: Citoyenne, 94, 100, 103; Black Duncan, 177, 178; Fritz, 229, 230; Noggs, 229; Comet, 238; visit to Manchester, 95; work for London Library, 99; generosity, 104, 111, 131, 169, 180, 188, 192, 209, 221, 225, 226, 229, 232, 236, 238, 242, 248; publishes lectures, 112, 113; declines Chair of History at Edinburgh, 116; visits Cromwell's country, 134; writes Past and Present, 153; difficulty in getting materials, 173; his pessimism, 203, 207; work-room, 213; elected Lord Rector of Edinburgh, 233; receives Prussian Order of Merit, 247; refuses Grand Cross of the Bath, 247; letter to Dr. John Carlyle, 251; his death, 255, 260; burial, 256, 258; memorial to, 269.
- Chartism, success of, 98.
- Cheyne Row, Carlyle's home in, 49, 50; description of, 49.
- Cook, Anne, 52.
- Craigputtock, scenery of, 8; loneliness of, 45; quietness of, 49, 108; work done there, 72; Mrs. Carlyle comes into possession of, 123; given to the University of Edinburgh, 264.
- Cromwell, Oliver, lectures on, 98; visit to home of, 134.
- Cromwell, Oliver, Life of, begun, 105, 108; work upon, 120, 126, 160; finished, 179; new edition of, 187.
- Darwin, Charles, 252.
- De Quincey, Thomas, Carlyle's portrait of, 24.
- Diamond Necklace, The, 47, 72.
- Dickens, Charles, his admiration for French Revolution, 85; meets Carlyle, 108; readings of, 228.
- Diderot, memoirs of, 46.
- Disraeli, Benjamin, offers Carlyle pension and Grand Cross of the Bath, 18, 247.
- Divine Right of Squires, The, 119.
- Dumfries, Mrs. Hanning at, 187, 192; Carlyle visits, 244, 259; Dr. Carlyle there, 240.
- Ecclefechan, birthplace of Carlyle, 42, 89, 246; burial-place of Carlyle, 255, 258, 261.
- Edinburgh, Carlyle attends University of, 42; Carlyle goes to live at, 46; Carlyle declines Chair of History, 116; Dr. Carlyle at, 228; Carlyle, Lord Rector of University of, 234.
- Eisenach, Carlyle's description of, 30.
- Emerson, Ralph Waldo, visit of, to Mrs. Hanning, 39; visit to Carlyle, 47; friendliness of, 52; letter to, 53; last visit to England, 242.
- Erskine, Thomas, friendship of, with Carlyle, 101, 105, 154, 187; death of, 238.
- Fame, Carlyle's estimate of, 119.
- Fitzgerald, Edward, about Naseby Field, 140.
- Fraser's Magazine, Cagliostro appears in, 47; Sartor Resartus appears in, 50; Diamond Necklace, The, appears in, 72.
- Frederick the Great, preparation for, 205, 215; toil upon, 221, 224, 227, 229; finished, 231.
- French Revolution, inception of, 46; work upon, 51, 53, 65; completion of, 66; reception of, in France, 85; reception of, in England, 85; reviews of, 86.

- Froude, James Anthony, in error, 39, 45, 77; friendship of, with Carlyle, 50, 252; reference of, to Jeffrey, 156.
- German Literature, Carlyle's lectures on, 74.
- Gill, the, described, 168.
- Goethe, Johann Wolfgang, Carlyle's discipleship of, 45.
- Haddington, Mrs. Carlyle's burial-place at, 234, 246.
- Hamilton, C. W., Mrs. Hanning moves to, 199; Mrs. Hanning's home, 225; Bank, 226, 232.
- Hanning, Janet Carlyle, emigration of, to Canada, 38, 195, 196, 204; letters to, 52, 54, 61, 63, 66, 75, 77, 87, 93, 96, 105, 109, 115, 129, 147, 150, 175, 187, 192, 196, 198, 206, 210, 217, 220, 223, 226, 229, 232, 236, 238, 242, 243, 248, 254, 256, 259, 266; residence of, at Manchester, 56, 95; residence of, at Kirtlebridge, 96; residence of, at Dumfries, 187, 192, 204; residence of, at Hamilton, 199, 225; death of, 270. See, also, Carlyle, Janet.
- Hanning, Robert, character of, 38; Carlyle's regard for, 55, 107; father of, 90; his emigration to America, 96, 117.
- Hunt, Leigh, his assistance to Carlyle, 49.
- Influenza, Carlyle's account of, 70.
- Jeffrey, Francis, his refusal to recommend Carlyle, 47; Carlyle's comment on, 158.
- Journal, Carlyle's, extracts from, 60, 250.
- Kirtlebridge, home of the Hannings at, 96.
- Knox, John, 98.
- Latter-Day Pamphlets, 195.
- Library, London, the, Carlyle's work for, 99; of the British Museum, the, 126, 174.
- Llanblethian, 22.
- London, Carlyle moves to, 48; weather of, 111.
- Mainhill, surroundings of, 262; house of the Carlyles at, 263.
- Manchester, Mrs. Hanning's residence at, 56; Carlyle's impressions of, 95.
- Martineau, Harriet, 74; visit of Carlyle to, 115.
- Mill, John Stuart, Carlyle's friendship with, 45; and the French Revolution, 51.
- Millais, his portrait of Carlyle, 251.
- Milnes, Richard Monckton, visit to, 114.
- Mirabeau, Carlyle's Memoirs of, 60.
- Mitchell, Helen, 117.
- Naseby, Carlyle's description of, 29, 145; Edward Fitzgerald's account of, 139.
- Neuberg, Mr., service to Carlyle, 206.
- Newby, 115.
- Oliphant, Mrs., sketch of Carlyle, 234.
- Past and Present, 153.
- Portraits of Carlyle, 162, 167, 206, 209, 251.
- Queen, the, attempts on her life, 128; converses with Carlyle, 238.
- Ruskin, John, 228.
- Sartor Resartus, early failure of, 50; American edition of, 52; later success of, 113; inception of, 263.
- Scotsbrig, Carlyle's description of, 21, 168; visits to, 80, 191; another account of, 265.

- Smail, Betty, history of, 86; help-fulness of, 91.
 Sterlings, the, 91.
 Sterling, John, 50; regard of, for Carlyle, 171; illness of, 174; Carlyle's life of, 197.
 Templand, 123.
 Tennyson, Alfred, Carlyle's portrait of, 99.
 Teufelsdröckh, Carlyle's fondness for, 113.
 Thackeray, W. M., Carlyle's account of, 86.
 Tobacco, Carlyle's fondness for, 114, 136, 138, 155, 168, 181, 186, 255; Mrs. Margaret Carlyle's use of, 92.
 Troston, Carlyle's visit there, 133, 148.
 Webster, Daniel, Carlyle's portrait of, 23.
 Welsh, Mrs., death of, 123.

The Riverside Press

CAMBRIDGE, MASSACHUSETTS, U. S. A.

ELECTROTYPED AND PRINTED BY

H. O. HOUGHTON AND CO.

UNIVERSITY OF CALIFORNIA LIBRARY
Los Angeles

This book is DUE on the last date stamped below.

PR Carlyle - 4433 Letters of Thomas
A3 Carlyle
1899

UC SOUTHERN REGIONAL LIBRARY FACILITY

AA 000 365 507 3

PR 4433
A3
1899

